CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

SIXTY-THIRD CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

MONDAY, April 6, 1914.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou art sending us to-day the glad, new message of the springtime, a message of hope and promise, a message that fulfills all Thou hast spoken to us in the past, and that lures us on to the fuller revelation of Thy purpose in life. We pray that our hearts may be attuned to God's great purpose, and that we may have the inspiration of the life that now is as a full promise of the life that is to come. Out of a deep sense of our dependence upon God, with hearts full of gratitude to Thee, may we address ourselves to the tasks of this day as God's stewards. Holding in trust the welfare of a great Nation, may we so apply ourselves as to be guided by the Divine spirit, and may we work faithfully and well for the good and peace and prosperity of all the people. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last when, on request of Mr. MCCUMBER and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS (S. DOC. NO. 462).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of March 25, a detailed statement showing the expenditures for each river and each harbor, geographically arranged by States and Territories, together with expenditures of like character for general and joint improvements not separable by States, and for canals.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to have the communication printed at once, as it is supplemental to a document printed about two years ago in response to a resolution which I submitted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Printed as a public document?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AUTOMOBILE SERVICE IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS (S. DOC. NO. 461).

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, there have on several occasions recently been inquiries made about the automobiles in use under the different departments of the Government, and questions have several times been asked of me as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in respect to the matter. I was unable to answer the interrogatories propounded to me on the floor of the Senate and had not felt that it was obligatory for me as chairman of the committee to undertake an investigation of the service.

The inquiries, however, did induce me to write a letter to the head of each executive department and each independent bureau of the Government asking for detailed information. That information has been received, and I am sure it will be very valuable to the committees having charge of the appropriation bills and very valuable to Members of both branches of Congress. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 13044) to pension widows and minor and helpless children of officers and enlisted men who served during the war with Spain or the Philippine insurrection or in China between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10138) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of such soldiers and sailors, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. ADAIR, and Mr. LANHAM managers at the conference on the part of the House.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented petitions of sundry citizens of Fairmount, Ligonier, Verhune, Muncie, Indianapolis, Hamilton, Mishawaka, and Bicknell, all in the State of Indiana, and of sundry citizens of Muskegon, Stanton, Detroit, Monroe, Mason, Sturgis, Girard, Fortsville, and Coldwater, all in the State of Michigan, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KENYON presented memorials of sundry citizens of Davenport and Clinton, in the State of Iowa, remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Jefferson, Buxton, Guthrie, Clarinda, Battle Creek, and Sheffield, all in the State of Iowa, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented a memorial of the Socialist Party of Norwich, Conn., remonstrating against the treatment of "Mother" Jones in the mining district of Colorado, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Willimantic, Conn., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Naugatuck Valley Branch, No. 189, National Association of Civil Service Employees, of Derby, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation to grant pensions to superannuated civil-service employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. CLAPP presented memorials of sundry citizens of St. Paul, Beaulieu, and Moorhead, all in the State of Minnesota, remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Epworth League of the Wesley Church, of Minneapolis, Minn., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LODGE presented memorials of sundry citizens of Springfield, Holyoke, Chicopee, Longmeadow, Palmer, Ludlow, Indian Orchard, and North Chester, all in the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented memorials of sundry citizens of Onaway, Adrian, and Jackson, all in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Monitor Lodge, No. 163, Vasa Order of America, of Ishpeming, Mich., praying that an appropriation be made for the erection of a monument to the memory of Capt. John Ericsson, which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Grand Traverse, Mich., remonstrating against the repeal of the exemption clause of the Panama Canal act, which was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented a petition of the Retail Credit Men's Association of Spokane, Wash., praying for the enactment of legislation to limit to $500 the debt-exemption privilege of the postal savings bank act, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a memorial of Local Union No. 2257, United Mine Workers of America, of Black Diamond, Wash., remonstrating against the treatment accorded miners in the mining district of Colorado, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. DU PONT presented petitions of sundry citizens of Wilmington, Marshallton, Huntington, Millville, Middletown, and Harrington, all in the State of Delaware, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GRONNA presented an affidavit in support of the bill (S. 5149) granting an increase of pension to Charlotte A. Hewitt, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 4522) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," approved June 29, 1906, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 407) thereon.

Mr. FALL, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 2278) granting the El Paso & Rock Island Railway Co. a right of way for its pipe lines and reservoir upon the Lincoln National Forest for the carrying and storage of water for railroad purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 408) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CUMMINS:

A bill (S. 5156) donating a brass or bronze cannon to the incorporated town of Alden, Iowa; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 5157) to provide for the relief of contestants who in good faith have attempted to enter public lands in the exercise of the preference right granted to successful contestants (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. 5158) granting a pension to William W. Batterton; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ROBINSON:

A bill (S. 5159) to authorize the establishment and maintenance of camp and pavilion hospitals for the use and treatment of Indians afflicted with tuberculosis and trachoma; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A bill (S. 5160) granting an increase of pension to Jacob D. Cook; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHAFROTH:

A bill (S. 5161) for the relief of the heirs of Benjamin Spencer, deceased; to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. 5162) granting an increase of pension to Alice M. Robinson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. OLIVER:

A bill (S. 5163) granting an increase of pension to Harriet M. Case; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GALLINGER:

A bill (S. 5164) granting an increase of pension to Henry McDevitt (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BURLEIGH:

A bill (S. 5165) granting an increase of pension to George H. Erskine; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 5166) granting an increase of pension to Susan J. Cantrell; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CRAWFORD:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 138) appropriating money for the payment of certain claims on account of labor, supplies, materials, and cash furnished in the construction of the main supply canal, Bellefourche project, South Dakota (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROBINSON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $100,000 for the erection, equipment, and maintenance of camp and pavilion hospitals for the use of afflicted Indians, and especially for the treatment of Indians afflicted with tuberculosis and trachoma, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRISTOW submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $800 for the building of a bridge across the Chilocco Creek where it intersects the State line of Kansas and the Chilocco School Reservation in Oklahoma, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $4,600 for the maintenance of an assay office at Salt Lake City, Utah, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SAULSBURY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I submit a resolution which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 331) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interoceanic Canals be permitted to employ a stenographer temporarily on account of the absence, due to illness, of the regular stenographer, and that the pay of said stenographer be at the rate of $100 per month for each day of such employment, not exceeding one month; and be it

Resolved further, That such services be paid for out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS subsequently, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred the foregoing resolution, reported it favorably, without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

MINING ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day.

The SECRETARY. Motion by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] to discharge the Committee on Mines and Mining from the further consideration of the bill (S. 4898) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, and sodium on the public domain, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask for a vote on the motion. My colleague [Mr. WALSH], the chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining, stated on the floor upon Saturday, when this matter was up, that he would not resist the motion; that he would not object to it, and that while he would not be present to-day he has no objection to its being acted upon in his absence. I stated at the time that I would not ask for action on it to-day, if he preferred. He protested and stated that he had no objection to its being acted upon to-day.

It is the sense of the Public Lands Committee that the bill ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands, and I think the history of legislation in this body will show that that is correct. All such bills have always gone to the Public Lands Committee of the Senate, and they are now going to the Public Lands Committee of the House. Therefore I ask for a vote on the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MYERS. When this matter was up on Saturday my colleague [Mr. WALSH], the chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining, made the following statement in relation to another bill:

I may say, Mr. President, that with it, however, another bill was offered by me, Senate bill 4983. If the bill referred to goes to the Committee on Public Lands, Senate bill 4983 should go likewise to that committee.

My colleague thereby expressed a desire that if one bill goes to the Committee on Public Lands the other should go to the Public Lands Committee. They relate to the same subject, treating it in a somewhat different manner, but very closely allied and akin. In that language my colleague expressed the wish that the two bills should go together. I therefore move that the Committee on Mines and Mining be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 4983) amending sections 2347, 2348, and 2350 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. I ask for a vote on the motion at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 323, submitted by Mr. POINDEXTER on the 1st instant, as follows:

Whereas the British Embassy to the United States has formally, in writing, admitted that we have a right to exempt our coastwise trade from Panama Canal tolls, and the British minister of foreign affairs has officially, in writing, declared that many of the material provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty do not apply to the Panama Canal, because that canal was constructed under conditions not contemplated by either party at the time the treaty was made; and

Whereas the "particular object" of both the Clayton-Bulwer and the Hay-Pauncefote treaties was the construction of a canal at Nicaragua, and the "general principle" referred to in said treaties contemplated and expressly stated that a treaty should be made with reference to a particular canal, and no such treaty has been made with reference to Panama; and

Whereas the United States acquired the Panama Railway and the Panama Canal wholly from the Republic of Colombia, the French Canal Co., and the Republic of Panama, and not from Great Britain, and that Great Britain had no rights, titles, or claims of any kind whatsoever in or to said Panama Railway or Panama Canal or the country in which the same were built, and never asserted any such claim or interest either to said French Canal Co., the Republic of Colombia, or the Republic of Panama, and has no such interest or legal right now, either by treaty or otherwise; and

Whereas our policy as to canal tolls was settled by act of Congress and by the official statement of the last administration made to the British Government; and

Whereas, notwithstanding the aforesaid formal admissions of the British embassy and the British minister of state for foreign affairs, and notwithstanding after full consideration the question was solemnly settled by both the executive and legislative branches of this Government, the President on the 5th of March last appeared in person before the Congress and "urged with the utmost earnestness of which he was capable," upon the ground of his own "personal responsibility," that the position so deliberately taken by this Government be reversed, and that his request be granted "in ungrudging measure," without "raising the question of whether we were right or wrong," and no reasons are given by the President for his conclusions, and the request is based especially on the ground that he "shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence" unless it shall be granted; and

Whereas no statement has been made to Congress what these matters are, and in order to act advisedly on said request it is essential that the Senate shall be informed thereon, and if they are of such near consequence and great delicacy as to require a surrender to foreign opinion without question as to whether we were right or wrong, the Senate can not properly consider the question submitted and many other vital questions before it without being advised as to the nature and identity of said matters referred to by the President, and it is the desire of the Senate to give thorough consideration to the views of the President: Therefore it is

Resolved by the Senate, That the President is hereby respectfully requested to inform the Senate, in confidence if he so desires, what are the unnamed matters of "nearer consequence and greater delicacy" referred to in said message; and

Resolved further, That action on the bill for the repeal of the tolls exemption clause of the Panama Canal act, and all consideration thereof by the Senate or by the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, be deferred until the information called for by this resolution can be obtained.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Washington I just saw outside the Chamber. I do not know whether he wishes to have the resolution taken up this morning or not. I suggest that it be tabled temporarily, subject to his call when he comes into the Chamber.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let it go over another day.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the resolution will go over until to-morrow, without prejudice.

PROPOSED RULE RELATIVE TO EXECUTIVE SESSIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the following resolution, coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 327, submitted by Mr. KENYON on the 4th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the judgment of the Senate that all executive sessions shall hereafter be open to the public, except when treaties are considered or when the Senate, by unanimous consent, orders otherwise; and the Committee on Rules is directed to prepare such amendments to the present rules, or to prepare new rules, or both, as may be necessary to carry out the terms of this resolution, and present the same to the Senate for action thereon.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to make a point of order upon the resolution. It is an effort to change the rules by a resolution. If the resolution were passed, it would require the Committee on Rules to proceed to prepare, under the direction of the Senate, a new rule. It in effect is a procedure to amend the rules. The rules themselves prescribe the way in which amendments can be made. The rules require that an amendment to the rules must be preceded by a notice from a Senator that it is the purpose of the Senator to tender an amendment to the rules, specifying the rule to be amended and the amendment contemplated. Then on a subsequent day the amendment itself may be presented, and it must be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to have the resolution read again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be again read.

The Secretary again read Mr. KENYON'S resolution.

Mr. McCUMBER. As the matter when it comes up will require a great deal of discussion, I will ask both the Senator proposing the resolution and the Senator making the point of order if they will not consent that it may go over, and with it the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. KENYON. My attention was diverted. What was the request of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not make a request. I asked if it would not be entirely agreeable to both the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Georgia that the resolution and the point of order might go over without prejudice.

Mr. KENYON. It is agreeable to me that it may go over without prejudice, so it will not lose any of its rights.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the resolution goes over without prejudice. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there are three things relating to the address which I shall make to-day which I greatly desire. First, to finish it in the shortest possible time consistent with the magnitude of the subject; second, to bring into the RECORD as many of the evidential facts as are possible within that time; and, third, to present them in their logical order.

Ordinarily I think a running debate with pertinent questions and suggestions is beneficial, but I am certain, with the earnest feeling and conviction manifest on this particular subject, the questioner will not be able to keep himself within the limits of a simple question, and yielding for such purpose would destroy the continuity and improperly lengthen the argument. It is for that reason that I would prefer to reply to any questions or suggestions at the close of the argument.

Mr. President, the President of the United States, in his message delivered to the two branches of Congress on March 5, says:

In my own judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption (the exemption of our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls) constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view.

In that same sentence the President further declares that this exemption from the payment of tolls—is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901.

Now, will the Senate meet the President fairly and honestly on these two issues, and freeing them from all other considerations, from all prejudices, jealousies, and selfish interests, meet him in a calm and judicial discussion of those questions? Or will we, as we have heretofore done, continue to avoid the real merits of those two propositions, and attack them from behind what may be public sentiment in favor of exercising complete sovereignty over a canal owned by us and paid for by us? Will we hide behind the flag while we burglarize the American Treasury for the benefit of the coastwise shipping interest, which has no competitor in the world, and which is to-day diverting the public mind from the real question by playing upon our national pride and sentiment?

If the discussions of the past and the evident purpose of the present are any criterion, I have grave apprehension that there is a purpose not to meet either of those two issues squarely; that we will seek to avoid the real question, and concentrate public attention on the claim that other nations are attempting to dictate our domestic policy, are questioning our sovereignty over our own property, and, backed by a natural sentiment of resentment which every people have against interference of other nations in what they deem their own affairs, hope to obscure the real question of contractual rights and obligations, and the real question of the propriety of exempting our vessels from the payment of tolls as a national policy.

It may be that we will be able to so deceive the people of the country, but I am so certain that the American public wants to adopt a policy that will be just to all the people as a domestic policy, and wants to keep the word of this country good and its honor unstained in the eyes of the world, that I shall vote in accordance with what I believe would be their attitude if the truth were not hidden from them, and accept whatever consequence a righteous vote may bring.

Mr. President, I know how difficult is the effort to get the real question before the country. The question whether we have entered into a contract is a question of cold fact. The question of international interference is always a sentimental and sensational one, and therefore easily gains greater publicity. But in the face of all this sentiment and sensationalism, I shall attempt to rescue the real and only true issues and bring them before the people and before the Senate.

Some of my friends on the other side of this question, with a rather flippant tone and gesture, say to me: "Well, you will find considerable difficulty in convincing the American people generally that we can not do as we please with a canal which we built with our own money. The public is not going to bother themselves about treaty agreements. They know we paid for the land, and we paid for the canal, and they will not allow any other country to question any right incident to complete ownership."

Well, Mr. President, that may end the matter with those whose courage parts company with their convictions whenever these convictions are not supported by a preponderance of public sentiment. From my standpoint it would be a cowardly course to end the matter right there. If the American people do not know that we entered into a solemn agreement as a part of the purchase price of the right to own that land and construct that canal, then I conceive it to be the moral duty of those representatives of the people who do know it, to impart that information to them, rather than conform their own views to square with a sentiment based upon public misinformation. Give the public the truth, and it can always be relied upon to do the right thing and the honorable thing. And one of our most important duties as representatives of the people is to make that truth known to them.

Mr. President, the one great virtue which has placed the name of the immortal Lincoln in the highest niche of political fame is that he never, in all his battles in the political arena, misrepresented the position of his adversary; he never attempted to refute a proposition of his opponent until he had stated that proposition as accurately, as fairly, and as favorably as the proponent himself could have stated it; he never availed himself of any mere temporary or unworthy or questionable weapon of warfare. And we on this side of the chamber, who draw our republican inspiration from such a lofty source, may well emulate the founder of our party in the discussion of these two clearly presented propositions which the President has submitted for our unbiased consideration.

I confess I have little use for that character of debate which substitutes abuse for argument or places an adversary in a false position and then assails that position. Let me say to my Republican friends that in my humble judgment the results of the application of Democratic domestic policies to the industries of this country will give us all the ammunition we shall need for honorable political warfare. And we shall not need to avail ourselves of the bushman's poisoned arrow or the redskin's ambuscade.

Let us treat the President as we should wish to be treated. He has never uttered a sentence that could be fairly construed into the surrender of a domestic right to purchase peace or good will. He has simply stated to the American public that after very full and mature consideration his conclusion is that our treaty of November, 1901, obligates us to treat the vessels of every other nation passing through the canal the same as we treat our own vessels; that every other nation in the world gives that treaty the same construction that he gives it; that in conducting our sometimes delicate diplomatic relations it would be helpful to him if we would place this country right before the eyes of the world—redeem it not only from what he believes is a violation of an international contract, but redeem it also from what he knows is a universal belief that our country is not faithful in the maintenance of its national obligations.

We have no right to cull a mere phrase or portion of a phrase from his message, disconnect it from that which gives it its true color and meaning, and then accuse him of a view clearly contrary to his real intent.

You say the President has declared that we shall surrender our position, whether right or wrong, thereby intending to imply that if the two contentions balance in the scale of reason we should surrender. The President has said nothing of the kind, and we all know he has said nothing of the kind. It is true that he does use the words "right or wrong," but only in relation to a construction where the great weight of conviction is that we are wrong, and the remote possibility of our being right ought not to hold us to our contention. We know that he first declares that the exemption of our coastwise vessels is in plain contravention of our treaty; that everywhere else the language is given an interpretation which precludes the release of our vessels; that we accepted, if we did not originate, the language used in that treaty, and therefore ought not to interpret with too strained a reading of our own language in order to give it a construction favorable to our right; and that under these conditions we ought to reverse our action without questioning whether we were right or wrong in our construction, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and for the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation. The true, the only meaning of that entire paragraph is that in the light of his own honest conviction, in the light of the overwhelming consensus of world opinion against our contention, in the light of the fact that we ourselves have differed as to whether we have such a right, we ought not to put ourselves before the world in the position of a country which repudiates its national obligation and stains its national honor.

The President has never asked us to repeal the free-tolls provision of the Panama act through fear of any one power or any combination of powers. On the contrary, acknowledging our full power to do as we please without fear of any nation, using his own words, he declares:

We are too big, too powerful, too self-respecting a Nation to interpret with too strained or refined a reading the words of our own promises just because we have power enough to give us leave to read them as we please.

Do those words signify fear or recognition of weakness, or do they signify a lofty conception of national standards?

Not less unjust has been the press of this city in presenting the attitude of the President on this question. Its presentation has been worse than unfair. Truth has been buried beneath an avalanche of misrepresentation. But as surely as the God of Truth reigns I believe it will yet emerge from this débris of falsehood. Let his position be presented in the press as fairly as the lurid generalities of those who challenge his utterances are presented and his position will stand every test. If when you place in startling headlines occupying a whole sheet of your paper, Speaker CLARK places party pledges above the President's commands, you will print on the other side, President Wilson places national honor above party commands, the President need have no fear from this source when the people have had time to compare the two propositions and to absorb the truth.

Just as a plain American citizen let me say to the President, who is courageously braving assaults while standing by what I know he believes to be our national duty, that he may find some similarity of situation in the history of the Republican Party. In 1896 our party was tempest tossed on the waves of passion and discord. The crime of 1873, the crime of 1890, the crime of surrendering our country to the money powers, and hundreds of other crimes were poured upon us in unceasing volleys. Had a vote been taken as early as July of that year our party would have been swept bodily from the field of politics. But with the ranks depleted, with vast desertions, we never swerved from our line of duty. We raised the banner of financial integrity and we fought that battle to a successful issue. In those days the Republican leaders did not ask the question Is it popular? but, Is it right? And if they felt that the popular sentiment was the outgrowth of misinformation they were brave enough to meet it and their courage to stand by their convictions generally kept the party in power.

And so I believe that the attitude of the President in raising the banner of national honor, and battling for that honor, will not, when the truth is once known to the people, suffer because of his courageous stand.

About your party platforms I have nothing to say. The President is not the President of the Democratic Party alone. He represents this Government as one of the great world powers, and upon him rests to a very great degree the duty of maintaining the reputation of this country for probity among the other great nations of the world. This is unlike a mere party policy. It is not a policy concerning our domestic relations alone, but one which involves the honor and probity of our Government before the entire world. To maintain our honor in that relation is a duty especially devolved upon the President of the United States; and every true American ought to stand by him if he believes that he is earnest and honest in his convictions.

Mr. President, I wish we could once for all rid ourselves of those ridiculous hallucinations appearing so often in the press, and reflected in some of these petitions, that any portion of the American people ever seek or ever want an alliance, or any other relation with Great Britain different from that existing between this country and every other country in the world. The utter weakness of such an idea ought of itself to place it beyond the scope of any consideration whatever. The vast majority of the population of this country are from ancestry foreign to Great Britain. Certainly their sentiment could not be claimed to be favorable to any alliance or other relation inimical to the interests of the nations from which they sprang. If we then turn to the balance of our population, to those of the old American stock, whose names show their ancestry to have been English, Scottish, or Welsh, we ought to remember that the colonial ancestors of these people fought against Great Britain for seven long years to free themselves from a union with the mother country, and if there is any one people on the face of the earth that believe in the prophetic words of Washington against any entangling alliance it is the old American contingent of our national population. And not only this, but the whole history of this country shows a greater jealousy and rivalry toward Great Britain than any other country on the part of that old element of our nationality.

There is scarcely a political campaign in any State in this Union that is not shaped to meet the special sentiments of this and that hyphenated American element of our own country, but no one ever asks how this ticket or this political plank will look to this American-American. And why? Because we know that he has no special attachment for or animosity against any other nation on this globe. He has no prejudices or attachments outside of this country to appeal to.

Then what becomes of this mere scarecrow of an alliance between English-speaking countries of the world? It has less substance than an idle dream. It is an impossibility. And no man who has any conception of American sentiment need ever entertain the slightest hope or the slightest fear of such an event.

It is but natural, of course, that people who read the same literature, speak the same language, have to a certain extent passed through the same historical conditions, live under the same kind of laws and customs, and engage in the same kinds of commercial enterprises should have views that are akin and should strive alike to speed the day when commerce rather than military rivalry shall engage the thought of mankind. And in that effort for peaceful settlement of international difficulties every nation of the world, great and small, should share and join their efforts.

You charge the President with a desire to purchase peace. Stop a moment to think of that charge. Of all people in the world Great Britain would be the last one to war with this country. We have an advantage over Great Britain which we do not have over any other great nation. We have a population two and a quarter times as great as that of Great Britain. We have a territory one hundred times larger. We have resources compared with which hers are small and meager. Practically all her supplies of food and clothing must come from abroad, and she must keep open the avenues of trade in order that her people may live, while we can raise in this country all we may need for centuries to come, though we were closed out from all the rest of the world. We would find Great Britain vulnerable to attack in a thousand places where we would not be vulnerable at a single point. And more than all, with our enormous population we could in a week lay hold of her greatest dependency—Canada—from which possession we could never be dislodged. Canada is a sure hostage of peace so far as Great Britain is concerned. If we should ever have a war with that country we ourselves would make that war.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the very eloquent address made here the other day by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and I must say that while I admired it and was charmed with its diction, I can scarcely agree with him that any war clouds on the horizon could in the slightest degree change us from our course. But this very fact of our supreme power and position, the fact that we can with impunity break our word with another nation, ought to make us the more considerate of our international duties and obligations. We are too big in national power to be little in national integrity.

But while we should always keep in mind the prophetic admonition of Washington against entangling alliances with any other nation on this earth, we should give the same consideration to his equally sound and statesmanlike advice:

> Observe good faith and justice toward all nations. Cultivate peace and harmony with all.

His caution against habitual hatred of any other nation is no less forcible than his admonition against the dangers of too ardent an attachment to any other nation. "Both," he says, "make our Nation in some degree a slave."

Mr. President, the President of the United States is actuated by what he knows is right and honorable in this matter. If we make a contract with the mighty Empire of Germany, Russia, France, or Britain, we should keep our word; if we make a contract with little Costa Rica, we should keep it exactly the same. Our national honor should be above reproach by any people in the world. President Wilson speaks truly when he says:

> Whatever may be our differences of opinion concerning this much-debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal. We consented to the treaty; its language we accepted, if we did not originate it; and we are too big, too powerful, too self-respecting a Nation to interpret with too strained or refined a reading the words of our own promises just because we have power enough to give us leave to read them as we please.

The President is right. Every nation in the world construes that contract against the right which we claim. Every nation knows our previous attitude and our previous promises. Every utterance of ours for a hundred years justifies those nations in their belief, and we ought to redeem our obligation "without quibble or hesitation."

Mr. President, I have been waiting and watching to see if a single one of these petitions which have been coming to the Senate daily, and which condemn the repeal of the free-tolls act, would base its conclusion on the proposition which the President lays before the American people, that our agreement prohibits discrimination. The President says that this country entered into an agreement with another country whereby it bound itself to refrain from any discrimination in favor of the vessels of its own citizens in the matter of tolls. Now, not a single one of these petitions meets the proposition laid down by the President: Shall we maintain our national word? On the contrary, every one of them, and every one of the criticisms assume that we have not bound ourselves in any way. And if that assumption be true, so far as our international policy is concerned, these criticisms and petitions are well founded.

If, as the petitioners assume, our control over that canal differs in no respect from our control over our great inland rivers, and there rests upon us no obligation to treat that waterway in any manner other than we might treat a navigable river in the United States, then of course any challenge by any other country of our right to charge whatever tolls we see fit, or release from tolls altogether, would be worse than impertinence. It would be an international affront for which we might very properly demand an apology.

If, however, on the other hand, prior to the beginning of the construction of this canal we had no more right than the French company which started its construction, or any other people or country, to construct and operate an isthmian canal; if, acknowledging that we had no greater right than others, we had entered into an agreement with another nation, an agreement entered into at our own instance, with a Government which also had coastwise trade and thereby would also have an interest in such canal, that neither Government so interested should own or exercise a controlling interest in such canal; and if after the lapse of 50 years we should conclude that we did desire to own a controlling interest in such canal and applied to the other country to be released from the inhibition contained in that contract, that thereupon the other nation agreed to release us without releasing itself, but did so in consideration that we guarantee that not only the vessels of her people, but the vessels of the whole world should be treated exactly the same in the matter of tolls as the ships of our own people, then I believe that the vast majority of those people who sign these petitions would immediately say we should keep our national word. The fact that not a single one of these petitions mentions the real question at issue, the question of agreement, clearly indicates that this matter has not been brought to the attention of these petitioners. I have had many people speak to me on this subject, assuming just as these petitioners assume, but when I have asked them what we should do if, as a matter of fact, we had promised not to discriminate in favor of our own vessels, the invariable answer has been, we should keep our word. If we have made no such agreement, then I agree entirely with those who oppose free tolls, that we should not only eliminate from the consideration of the subject any suggestion by a foreign power but should resent it as an impertinence.

When we build a canal in the United States we do not make a contract with any other nation. The fact that we did make a contract with another nation concerning the Panama Canal presupposes that we did not have a free hand to do just as we pleased, but that we were compelled to secure certain rights, and that to secure those rights we naturally were compelled to bind ourselves to certain conditions to do something on our part. And what we want to arrive at is what we agreed to do.

So far as the international aspect of the case is concerned, I shall be guided wholly by the simple question: Did or did we not ratify an agreement which prohibits us from discriminating in favor of any of our vessels?

I shall now proceed to consider the legal proposition.

Mr. President, the remission of tolls to our coastwise vessels, or to any other vessels belonging to the citizens of the United States or of any other country, is a clear violation of our international agreement. When the Senate of the United States voted in favor of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty it did so on the clear and unequivocal understanding that this treaty on which it was voting, irrespective of any and all previous utterances and declarations of the Government, and irrespective of whether the old Clayton-Bulwer treaty was alive or dead, did bind this country to treat all vessels of the world on an equality with our own vessels. I will not say that there might not have been some individual Senator who might have carried in the secret chambers of his mind a conviction that he could at some future time, if called upon, give the treaty a different construction. What I do say is that if he had any such conviction he did not publicly disclose it in the debates, and he knew that the Senate as a body and the Committee on Foreign Relations which reported the treaty, as clearly shown in its reports, did understand that the treaty did bind us to this equality of treatment. And while there was a vigorous minority report by Senator Morgan, that minority report took no issue, but confirmed the construction placed upon the treaty by the majority.

With these two reports before the Senate it would be a slander upon both its judgment and its sense of integrity to say that while without a word of protest it voted for this treaty that it nevertheless so voted with a secret conviction that these committee reports, which gave a certain construction to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty—a construction in harmony with the views of Secretary Hay and Lord Pauncefote—could at some future time be repudiated.

I put this question squarely up to Senators on both sides of this Chamber: Admitting that the treaty by its terms does not preclude a construction authorizing us to discriminate in favor of our own vessels, but that both countries understood that it did so, that both Mr. Hay and Lord Pauncefote understood that it did preclude us from discriminating in favor of our vessels, and that the Senate when it confirmed the treaty knew that the parties understood it that way, and the Senate as a whole understood it the same way, would you then declare that, notwithstanding this mutual understanding, we should give it a construction contrary to what was then understood?

Or, putting it in another form, if the contract itself is uncertain as to its intent, but the parties to the contract were agreed as to its intent when they executed it, should or should not each party be morally bound to give the contract a construction in harmony with their intent when they executed it?

President Wilson says:

> The large thing to do is the only thing we can do, a voluntary withdrawal from the position everywhere questioned and misunderstood.

I do not go that far, and I do not need to go that far. What I say is, not that we shall not quibble if we do not agree upon the construction of the contract, but that we shall not violate the obligation which we both understood was the obligation incumbent upon us when we executed that agreement.

GENERAL PRINCIPLE.

Mr. President, to economize in time at this point, I shall omit all the earlier history pertaining to this question, every word of which gives added strength to my contention, and immediately proceed to the conditions surrounding the negotiations of the first and second Hay-Pauncefote treaties, reaching back of that only momentarily to draw from the old Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850 only a paragraph always referred to thereafter as the "general principle," and which was the only part of that old agreement retained, in any form, in the new. That "general principle" was expressed in these words:

> And the same canals or railways being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State—

And so forth.

This is our starting point. There is the "general principle"; and while it was reiterated a thousand times thereafter, it has never been reiterated in the sense that it has been modified.

We start right here from this "general principle," which guaranteed equality of treatment to not only vessels of the United States and Great Britain but also to vessels of all other nations. Now, that "general principle" was asserted and reasserted by both parties again and again down to the adoption of the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Up to that time it meant equality of treatment of all vessels, including those of the United States. If it is now to have another meaning, that other meaning must be found either in an expressed declaration to that effect, or in a clear inference because of change from individual to Government ownership and control of the canal.

At that time in the discussions in the press of our own country we took the position that the interest upon the investment and the operating expenses should be borne by all vessels passing through that canal. All our estimates for receipts in tolls to repay interest included all our vessels, coastwise and otherwise. That was what we understood on this side of the ocean. It might be well, therefore, to give a brief consideration of the view of the people on the other side of the ocean, who were a party to this contract, as to what was expected in the line of tolls in case this Government should construct the canal. It will be found that there was no disagreement in the understanding of the two nations.

I read the press of the country and I think all the material propositions that were disclosed at that time, and I do not remember finding a single sentence that sought in any way to differentiate our coastwise from our other shipping, or that did not admit that we were to charge all vessels the same.

I wish now to show the understanding of the British people, irrespective of officials, upon the same subject, as evidenced by the editorials in their papers at the time we approached Great Britain for a modification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

I shall quote a portion of a rather lengthy editorial from the Spectator of December 10, 1898, just after President McKinley had sent in his message pertaining to an American-owned canal.

Now, this is most important, in order to get the understanding of the people on the other side as to what we proposed, because that would have its natural influence upon the people who were conducting the negotiations.

This editorial reads as follows:

THE NICARAGUA CANAL.

> We pointed out at the end of last summer that it could not be long before our statesmen would have to bring their minds to bear upon the question of the Nicaragua Canal and the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and this is exactly what has happened. The assertion by the President of the United States in his message to Congress that "the construction [of the Nicaragua Canal] is now more than ever indispensable and our policy more imperatively than ever calls for its control by this Government," has at once brought the matter within the region of practical politics. We make no claim to any special prescience in the matter. The Americans have always longed for an interoceanic canal, and it was evident that directly they had acquired possessions in the West Indies opposite the coasts of Central America, and also an island empire in the Pacific, they would desire to link them by water communication. A revival of interest in the Nicaragua Canal was thus an inevitable sequence of the war. But the Americans can not obtain that control over the Nicaragua Canal which they desire unless we are willing to abandon our rights under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, an instrument under which both powers bound themselves not to obtain an exclusive control over any interoceanic canal. We and the Americans, that is, agreed some 48 years ago that a canal should only be made and controlled by the two powers acting together, and in no case by either power singly. * * * The people of this country have, therefore, to consider whether they will or will not veto the canal. We are glad to see already a good many indications that we do not intend to exercise our right of veto. The Times, in its leading article on the President's message, uses words which will, we believe, be indorsed not only by the Government but by the majority of English people. The Times says, most reasonably, that "if the freedom of the waterway were secured—to ships of all nations, as in the case of the Suez Canal—

Now mark the words—

Which did not differentiate between Great Britain and any other country—to ships of all nations, as in the case of the Suez Canal, we do not see what object we should have in standing strictly upon claims which originated when the circumstances were altogether different. Not less statesmanlike has been the tone adopted by the St. James Gazette. It has, however, been suggested by the Daily Mail, on the other hand, that we ought not to give up our rights, and that we should insist upon a joint control of the waterway. We do not think, however, that this contention will, if it is carefully examined, find favor here. Joint control, in the first place, means joint guarantees and joint expenditure, and we do not believe that the people of this country are prepared to spend money in Nicaragua. We have plenty of objects nearer home on which to use our spare cash. When we can get all we want out of an interoceanic canal, controlled by America, why should we burden ourselves in the matter? The United States, as the power most nearly and vitally interested, may think it worth while to construct or help construct the canal, but our interests do not extend so far. All we want is that the canal shall be made, and that when it is made it shall be open and available to our merchant ships and ships of war as freely as to those of the United States or of other powers.

That is the view of the British public.

We merely want an open waterway that no one will be able to tamper with. Now, our contention is that we secure this object better through American control than by any other means. Indeed, if America holds the canal it will be of more use to us in time of war than if we held it ourselves. Supposing the canal ours or merely the property of Nicaragua, a hostile power might block it in the first instance as our property and in the second in defiance of a weak State. If, however, it is controlled by America, we need have no fear of being unable to use it, for it will be in hands strong enough to defend it. Take the case of a war with France, Russia, and Germany and the canal in the hands of the United States. In such a case we might be hard pressed and should find it most convenient to be able to pass our ships through the canal without having to guard its two mouths by protecting squadrons. The canal would be a great neutral harbor with two outlets. Only in the case of war with the United States would American control be anything but a benefit. But even in that case we doubt whether American control would be worse than joint control. The command of the sea would have to be fought out, and the canal would fall to the victor as the prize. We fail, then, to see why we should make ourselves disagreeable to the Americans by vetoing the canal. Rather we hold that we ought to look with the greatest possible satisfaction upon its construction. What is meant by "control" is a matter which requires attention. An able American publicist, Prof. Woolsey, of Yale, in his work on "America's Foreign Policy," recently published by the Century Co., of New York, has argued, and with considerable force and ingenuity, that America would gain nothing by exclusive control, and that she had much better claim no more rights in the canal than those given to any other power. Possibly he is right in theory, but in practice some one power will always have the control of any piece of territory, and so of every artificial waterway * * *.

We come now to the practical side of the question—

Says this editorial—

What answer are we to make to America if, or rather when, she asks us to agree to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty? It has been suggested that we should ask for compensation elsewhere, or try to make a bargain for trade facilities. Possibly the plan might succeed, but we confess we dislike such huckstering between nations, especially when they involve demands upon a nation's internal fiscal policy. We hold that it would not only be more dignified, but also more beneficial to us in the long run, to ask for no payment for giving up what has, as a matter of fact, proved merely a sort of double-barrelled agreement by England and America to play dog in the manger to each other. We would rather abrogate the treaty out of good will and good feeling than for any direct quid pro quo.

We would abrogate the treaty on the following terms: (4) That the canal should be open at all times to all nations at peace with the United States; (5) that the dues charged should be the same in the case of American and other vessels. If the United States were to agree, as we believe they would, to such terms as these, we could have no possible ground for refusing to give up our rights under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

That, Mr. President, was the public understanding on the other side of the ocean, as expressed by all their editorials, which were reflected again in similar editorials on this side.

CORRESPONDENCE SHOWING RETENTION OF GENERAL PRINCIPLE OF CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

It is equally clear that the representatives of the two Governments understood that the "general principle" of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was not to be varied because we became the owner of the canal.

In a letter from Lord Lansdowne to Mr. Lowther—you will remember that at that time Lord Lansdowne was foreign secretary of Great Britain and Mr. Lowther was chargé d'affaires of the British Government here—of date August 3, 1901, with great perseverance, the other party to this contract seeks to guard against any possible modification of that "general principle" which related to the equality of treatment of the vessels of all nations. Lord Lansdowne says:

I suggest the renewal of one of the stipulations of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention by adding to rule 1 the words, "such conditions and charges shall be just and equitable."

In that same letter I believe Lansdowne has proposed the following article to follow article 3:

ARTICLE 3A.

In view of the permanent character of this treaty whereby the general principle established by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention is reaffirmed, the high contracting parties hereby declare and agree that the rules laid down in the last preceding article shall, so far as they may be applicable, govern all interoceanic communications across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and that no change of territorial sovereignty, or other change of circumstances, shall affect such general principle or the obligations of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

In another letter between the same parties, dated September 12, 1901, after Mr. Hay had stated his objections to the previous amendment proposed by Lansdowne, which was designated article 3a, Lansdowne, referring to what Mr. Hay said, states:

Coming to article numbered 3a, which might be called article 4, Mr. Hay pointed out "that the preamble of the draft treaty retained the declaration that the 'general principle' of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention was not impaired."

That was the claim of Mr. Hay. Proceeding:

To reiterate this in still stronger language in a separate article, and to give article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention what seemed a wider application than it originally had, would, Mr. Hay feared, "not meet with acceptance." If, however, it seemed indispensable to His Majesty's Government that an article providing for the contingency of a change in sovereignty should be inserted, then that it might be stated: "It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country traversed by the beforementioned canal shall affect the 'general principle' of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty."

Remember "general principle" always refers to the general principle in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

This, Mr. President, was the view expressed by Mr. Hay himself, that it was not necessary to reassert that "general principle" because the preamble of the draft treaty retained the declaration that this "general principle" was not impaired.

That is what the preamble says. Could anything be clearer than that both parties intended this "general principle" without impairment to be adopted as part of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty? Would anyone contend that this "general principle" would not be modified, and thereby impaired, if our vessels were released from its provisions? It certainly would not be the same "general principle" established in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

This matter, Mr. President, is made doubly clear in the explanation sent by Mr. Hay to the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs in which he takes up the several objections of Great Britain to the amendment of the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty and gives a concise history of the negotiations.

In that instrument Mr. Hay says—he is talking now to the committee:

The proposed draft of the new treaty was submitted to Lord Lansdowne, and after mature deliberation he proposed on the part of His Majesty's Government only three substantial amendments.

He recognized the weighty importance of the change by which Great Britain was relieved of all responsibility for enforcing the neutrality and maintaining the security of the canal, and that all this burden was solely assumed by the United States. He also appreciated the importance of the other proposed changes in the direction of harmony.

Under this modified aspect of the relations of the two nations to the canal he was not indisposed to consent to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty if—

And these are Mr. Hay's words:

If "the general principle" of neutrality, which was reaffirmed in the preamble in the new treaty as well as of the former one, should be preserved and secured against any change of sovereignty or other change of circumstances in the territory through which the canal is intended to pass, and that the rules adopted as the basis of neutralization should govern, as far as possible—

I will stop right here to emphasize the words "as far as possible," because, as I shall show further in answer to some of the arguments, it was not expected that those portions of the rules pertaining to the Suez Canal which were not applicable should be considered as applicable, although they were taken as a whole and applied—as far as possible, to all interoceanic communication across the Isthmus. He referred—

I am still quoting Mr. Hay—in this connection to articles 1 and 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

He therefore proposed, by way of amendment, the insertion of an additional article.

This is article 3a, which I will have printed.

Thus, Mr. President, you will see how insistent the other party has been all along in these proceedings, that the "general principle" established in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty should not be abrogated or changed in any degree whatever, or for any cause whatever, whether through change of sovereignty or otherwise.

Then Mr. Hay goes on to say that the President thought that the amendment offered by Lansdowne was unnecessary and might give to the "general principle" of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty a broader significance than was intended in that treaty. He was content that it should have the same significance. But he proceeds to say to the Senate, and I again quote from Mr. Hay:

The President was, however, not only willing but desirous that "the general principle" of neutralization referred to in the preamble of this treaty should be applicable to this canal now intended to be built, notwithstanding any change of sovereignty or of international relations of the territory through which it should pass. This "general principle" of neutralization had always in fact been insisted upon by the United States—

I am still quoting the words of Mr. Hay giving the attitude of the President—and he recognized the entire justice of the request of Great Britain that if she should now surrender the material interest which had been secured to her by the first article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—

That was equality with American ships—which might result in the indefinite future, should the territory traversed by the canal undergo a change of sovereignty, this "general principle" should not be thereby affected or impaired.

Those are our declarations.

These views were communicated to His Majesty's Government—and as a substitute for the article proposed by Lord Lansdowne the following was proposed on the part of the United States.

Says Hay—

The provision is that which is now in the treaty, which provides that the change of sovereignty—which means the change of sovereignty from Panama to our own or any other Government—should not affect the "general principle" or the obligations of the high contracting parties.

Thus it will be seen that Great Britain was most insistent that the "general principle" of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, without modification, should be continued, and this country at that time asserted that that was also its purpose, that it should not be changed or impaired.

In a letter from Lord Lansdowne to Lord Pauncefote, ambassador to the United States, of date February 22, 1901, this determination to agree to a modification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty only upon condition that this "general principle," just as it appeared in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and without impairment, should be continued everywhere finds expression.

That letter is a most enlightening one, as indicating the viewpoint of the other party to the contract, and so clearly explains the matter that I ask to have it inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that may be done.

The letter referred to is as follows:

No. 2.

THE MARQUIS OF LANSDOWNE TO LORD PAUNCEFOTE.

FOREIGN OFFICE, February 22, 1901.

MY LORD: The American ambassador has formally communicated to me the amendments introduced by the Senate of the United States into the convention, signed at Washington in February last, to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

These amendments are three in number, namely:

1. The insertion in article 2, after the reference to article 8, of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, of the words "which convention is hereby superseded."

2. The addition of a new paragraph after section 5 of article 2 in the following terms:

"It is agreed, however, that none of the immediately foregoing conditions and stipulations in sections Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of this article shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order."

3. The excision of article 3, which provides that—

"The high contracting parties will, immediately upon the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, bring it to the notice of other powers and invite them to adhere to it."

Mr. Choate was instructed to express the hope that the amendments would be found acceptable by Her Majesty's Government.

It is our duty to consider them as they stand and to inform your excellency of the manner in which, as the subject is now presented to us, we are disposed to regard them.

It will be useful, in the first place, to recall the circumstances in which negotiations for the conclusion of an agreement supplementary to the convention of 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, were initiated.

So far as Her Majesty's Government were concerned, there was no desire to procure a modification of that convention. Some of its provisions had, however, for a long time past been regarded with disfavor by the Government of the United States, and in the President's message to Congress of December, 1898, it was suggested, with reference to a concession granted by the Government of Nicaragua, that some definite action by Congress was urgently required if the labors of the past were to be utilized, and the linking of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by a practical waterway to be realized. It was further urged that the construction of such a maritime highway was more than ever indispensable to that intimate and ready intercommunication between the eastern and western seaboards of the United States demanded by the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands and the prospective expansion of American influence and commerce in the Pacific, and that the national policy called more imperatively than ever for the "control" of the projected highway by the Government of the United States.

This passage in the message having excited comment, your excellency made inquiries of the Secretary of State in order to elicit some information as to the attitude of the President. In reply, the views of the United States Government were very frankly and openly explained. You were also most emphatically assured that the President had no intention whatever of ignoring the Clayton-Bulwer convention, and that he would loyally observe treaty stipulations. But in view of the strong national feeling in favor of the construction of the Nicaraguan Canal, and of the improbability of the work being accomplished by private enterprise, the United States Government were prepared to undertake it themselves upon obtaining the necessary powers from Congress. For that purpose, however, they must endeavor, by friendly negotiation, to obtain the consent of Great Britain to such a modification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as would, without affecting the "general principle" therein declared, enable the great object in view to be accomplished for the benefit of the commerce of the world. Although the time had hardly arrived for the institution of formal negotiations to that end, Congress not having yet legislated, the United States Government, nevertheless, were most anxious that your excellency should enter at once into pourparlers with a view to preparing for consideration a scheme of arrangement.

Her Majesty's Government agreed to this proposal, and the discussions which took place in consequence resulted in the draft convention which Mr. Hay handed to your excellency on the 11th January, 1899.

At that time the joint high commission over which the late Lord Herschell presided was still sitting. That commission was appointed in July, 1898, to discuss various questions at issue between Great Britain and the United States, namely, the fur-seal fishery, the fisheries off the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, the Alaskan boundary, alien-labor laws, reciprocity, transit of merchandise, mining rights, naval vessels on the Great Lakes, definition and marking of frontiers, and conveyance of persons in custody. But serious difficulties had arisen in the attempt to arrive at an understanding, and it had become doubtful whether any settlement would be effected.

In reply, therefore, to a request for a speedy answer with regrad to the convention, the Marquis of Salisbury informed Mr. White, the American chargé d'affaires, that he could not help contrasting the precarious prospects and slowness of the negotiations which were being conducted by Lord Herschell with the rapidity of decision proposed in the matter of the convention. Her Majesty's Government might be reproached with having come to a precipitate agreement on a proposal which was exclusively favorable to the United States, while they had come to no agreement at all on the controversy where there was something to be conceded on both sides.

Shortly afterwards Lord Herschell intimated that the difficulties in regard to the question of the Alaskan boundary seemed insuperable, and that he feared it might be necessary to break off the negotiations of which he had hitherto had the charge. Upon this Lord Salisbury informed Mr. White that he did not see how Her Majesty's Government could sanction any convention for amending the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, as the opinion of this country would hardly support them in making a concession which would be wholly to the benefit of the United States, at a time when they appeared to be so little inclined to come to a satisfactory settlement in regard to the Alaskan frontier.

The last meeting of the joint high commission took place on the 20th of February, 1899. Except for the establishment of a modus vivendi on the Alaskan frontier, no progress has been made since that date toward the adjustment of any of the questions which the high commissioners were appointed to discuss.

It was in these circumstances that the proposal for a canal convention was revived at the beginning of last year.

On the 21st of January your lordship reported that a bill, originally introduced in 1899, had been laid before Congress, empowering the President to acquire from the Republics of Costa Rica and Nicaragua the control of such portion of territory as might be desirable or necessary, and to direct the Secretary of War, when such control had been secured, to construct the canal and make such provisions for defense as might be required for the safety and protection of the canal and the terminal harbors.

It was probable that the bill would be passed, and it was clear that additional embarrassment would be caused by an enactment opposed to the terms of the proposed convention, and in direct violation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. On the other hand, your lordship's information led to the confident expectation that the convention as signed would, if agreed to by Her Majesty's Government, be ratified by the Senate.

In these circumstances Her Majesty's Government consented to reopen the question, and, after due consideration, determined to accept the convention unconditionally, as a signal proof of their friendly disposition and of their desire not to impede the execution of a project declared to be of national importance to the people of the United States.

Your Excellency stated that the United States Government expressed satisfaction at this happy result and appreciation of the conciliatory disposition shown by Her Majesty's Government.

The convention was forthwith submitted to the Senate for ratification, and on the 9th of March the committee charged with its examination reported in favor of ratification, with the insertion, subsequently adopted, after section 5 of article 2, of a paragraph containing provision that the rules laid down in the preceding sections should not apply to measures for the defense of the United States by its own forces and the maintenance of public order. This alteration was discussed by the Senate in secret session on the 5th of April, but no vote was taken upon it nor upon the direct question of ratification.

The bill empowering the President to construct and provide for the defense of the canal passed the House of Representatives by a large majority on the 2d of May. The Senate, however, postponed consideration of the bill, although favorably reported by the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

After the recess, during which the presidential election took place, the discussion was resumed in the Senate. On the 20th of December the vote was taken and resulted in the ratification of the convention with the three amendments which have been presented for the acceptance of His Majesty's Government.

The first of these amendments, that in article 2, declares the Clayton-Bulwer treaty to be "hereby superseded."

Before attempting to consider the manner in which this amendment will, if adopted, affect the parties to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, I desire to call your Excellency's attention to a question of principle which is involved by the action of the Senate at this point.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty is an international contract of unquestionable validity, a contract which, according to well-established international usage, ought not to be abrogated or modified, save with the consent of both the parties to the contract. In spite of this usage, His Majesty's Government find themselves confronted by a proposal communicated to them by the United States Government, without any previous attempt to ascertain their views, for the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

The practical effect of the amendment can best be understood by reference to the inclosed copy of the articles of the treaty, Nos. 1 and 6, which, assuming that the United States Government would undertake all the obligations imposed by article 4 of the treaty, contain the only provisions (printed in italics) not replaced by new provisions, covering the same ground, in the convention.

Under article 1 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty the two powers agreed that neither would occupy or fortify or colonize or assume or exercise any dominion over any part of Central America, nor attain any of the foregoing objects by protection afforded to or alliance with any State or people of Central America. There is no similar agreement in the convention. If, therefore, the treaty were wholly abrogated, both powers would, except in the vicinity of the canal, recover entire freedom of action in Central America. The change would certainly be of advantage to the United States and might be of substantial importance.

Under the other surviving portion of the treaty (part of article 6) provision is made for treaties with the Central American States in furtherance of the object of the two powers and for the exercise of good offices should differences arise as to the territory through which the canal will pass. In this case abrogation would, perhaps, signify but little to this country. There is nothing in the convention to prevent Great Britain from entering into communication or exercising good offices with the Central American States should difficulties hereafter arise between them and the United States.

The other two amendments present more formidable difficulties.

The first of them, which reserves to the United States the right of taking any measures which it may find necessary to secure by its own forces the defense of the United States, appears to His Majesty's Government to involve a distinct departure from the principle which has until now found acceptance with both Governments—the principle, namely, that in time of war as well as in time of peace the passage of the canal is to remain free and unimpeded, and is to be so maintained by the power or powers responsible for its control.

Were this amendment added to the convention the United States would, it is presumed, be within their rights if at any moment when it seemed to them that their safety required it, in view of warlike preparations not yet commenced, but contemplated or supposed to be contemplated by another power, they resorted to warlike acts in or near the canal—acts clearly inconsistent with the neutral character which it has always been sought to give it, and which would deny the free use of it to the commerce and navies of the world.

It appears from the report of the Senate committee that the proposed addition to article 2 was adopted from article 10 of the Suez Canal convention, which runs as follows:

"Similarly, the provisions of articles 4, 5, 7, and 8 shall not interfere with the measures which His Majesty the Sultan and His Highness the Khedive, in the name of His Imperial Majesty, and within the limits of the firmans granted, might find it necessary to take for securing by their own forces the defense of Egypt and the maintenance of public order. (Article 4 guarantees that the Maritime Canal shall remain open in time of war as a free passage even to the ships of war of belligerents, and regulates the revictualing, transit, and detention of such vessels in the canal. Article 5 regulates the embarkation and disembarkation of troops, munitions, or materials of war by belligerent powers in time of war. Article 7 prohibits the powers from keeping any vessel of war in the waters of the canal. Article 8 imposes on the agents of the signatory powers in Egypt the duty of watching over the execution of the treaty, and taking measures to secure the free passage of the canal.)

"In case His Imperial Majesty the Sultan, or His Highness the Khedive, should find it necessary to avail themselves of the exceptions for which this article provides, the signatory powers of the declaration of London shall be notified thereof by the Imperial Ottoman Government.

"It is likewise understood that the provisions of the four articles aforesaid shall in no case occasion any obstacle to the measures which the Imperial Ottoman Government may think it necessary to take in order to insure by its own forces the defense of its other possessions situated on the eastern coast of the Red Sea."

It is, I understand, contended in support of the Senate amendment that the existence of the above provisions in the Suez Canal convention justifies the demand now made for the insertion of analogous provisions in regard to the proposed Nicaragua Canal.

But the analogy which it has been attempted to set up fails in one essential particular. The banks of the Suez Canal are within the dominions of a territorial sovereign, who was a party to the convention, and whose established interests it was necessary to protect, whereas the Nicaragua Canal will be constructed in territory belonging not to the United States, but to Central American States, of whose sovereign rights other powers can not claim to dispose.

Moreover, it seems to have escaped attention that article 10 of the Suez Canal convention receives most important modification from article 11, which lays down that "the measures which shall be taken in the cases provided for by articles 9 and 10 of the present treaty shall not interfere with the free use of the canal." The article proceeds to say that "in the same cases, the erection of permanent fortifications contrary to the provisions of article 8 is prohibited."

The last paragraph of article 8, which is specially alluded to, runs as follows:

"They [i. e., the agents of the signatory powers in Egypt] shall especially demand the suppression of any work or the dispersion of any assemblage on either bank of the canal, the object or effect of which might be to interfere with the liberty and the entire security of the navigation."

The situation which would be created by the addition of the new clause is deserving of serious attention. If it were to be added, the obligation to respect the neutrality of the canal in all circumstances would, so far as Great Britain is concerned, remain in force; the obligation of the United States, on the other hand, would be essentially modified. The result would be a one-sided arrangement under which Great Britain would be debarred from any warlike action in or around the canal, while the United States would be able to resort to such action to whatever extent they might deem necessary to secure their own safety.

It may be contended that if the new clause were adopted, section 7 of article 2, which prohibits the erection of fortifications, would sufficiently insure the free use of the canal. This contention is, however, one which His Majesty's Government are quite unable to admit. I will not insist upon the dangerous vagueness of the language employed in the amendment, or upon the absence of all security as to the manner in which the words might, at some future time, be interpreted. For even if it were more precisely worded, it would be impossible to determine what might be the effect if one clause permitting defensive measures and another forbidding fortifications were allowed to stand side by side in the convention. To His Majesty's Government it seems, as I have already said, that the amendment might be construed as leaving it open to the United States at any moment, not only if war existed, but even if it were anticipated, to take any measures, however stringent or far-reaching, which, in their own judgment, might be represented as suitable for the purpose of protecting their national interests. Such an enactment would strike at the very root of that "general principle" of neutralization upon which the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was based, and which was reaffirmed in the convention as drafted.

But the import of the amendment stands out in stronger relief when the third proposal is considered. This strikes out article 3 of the convention, under which the high contracting parties engaged, immediately upon the convention being ratified, to bring it to the notice of other powers and to invite their adherence. If that adherence were given, the neutrality of the canal would be secured by the whole of the adhering powers. Without that adherence it would depend only upon the guaranty of the two contracting powers. The amendment, however, not only removes all prospect of the wider guaranty, but places this country in a position of marked disadvantage, compared with other powers which would not be subject to the self-denying ordinance which Great Britain is desired to accept. It would follow, were His Majesty's Government to agree to such an arrangement, that while the United States would have a treaty right to interfere with the canal in time of war, or apprehended war, and while other powers could with a clear conscience disregard any of the restrictions imposed by the convention, Great Britain alone, in spite of her enormous possessions on the American continent, in spite of the extent of her Australasian colonies and her interests in the East, would be absolutely precluded from resorting to any such action or from taking measures to secure her interests in and near the canal.

I request that your excellency will explain to the Secretary of State the reasons, as set forth in this dispatch, why His Majesty's Government feel unable to accept the convention in the shape presented to them by the American ambassador, and why they prefer, as matters stand at present, to retain unmodified the provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. His Majesty's Government have, throughout these negotiations, given evidence of their earnest desire to meet the views of the United States. They would on this occasion have been ready to consider in a friendly spirit any amendments of the convention, not inconsistent with the principles accepted by both Governments, which the Government of the United States might have desired to propose, and they would sincerely regret a failure to come to an amicable understanding in regard to this important subject.

Your lordship is authorized to read this dispatch to the Secretary of State and to leave a copy in his hands.

I am, etc.,

LANSDOWNE.

Mr. McCUMBER. In that letter, referring to the great desire of the United States Government to free itself from the provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty prohibiting its control of a canal, Lord Lansdowne says—and remember this was addressed to Lord Pauncefote—referring to the President's message:

> This passage in the message having excited comment, your excellency made inquiries of the Secretary of State in order to elicit some information as to the attitude of the President. In reply, the views of the United States Government were very frankly and openly explained. You were also most emphatically assured that the President had no intention whatever of ignoring the Clayton-Bulwer convention, and that he would loyally observe treaty stipulations. But in view of the strong national feeling in favor of the construction of the Nicaragua Canal, and of the improbability of the work being accomplished by private enterprise, the United States Government were prepared to undertake it themselves upon obtaining the necessary powers from Congress. For that purpose, however, they must endeavor, by friendly negotiation, to obtain the consent of Great Britain to such a modification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as would, without affecting the "general principle" therein declared, enable the great object in view to be accomplished for the benefit of the commerce of the world.

I again call special attention to the statement which will be confirmed by the correspondence in the office of the Secretary of State that Pauncefote was most emphatically assured that the President had no intention whatever of ignoring the Clayton-Bulwer convention, and that he would loyally observe treaty stipulations; and that for the purpose of obtaining the right to build this canal the United States must proceed by friendly negotiations to obtain the consent of Great Britain to such a modification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as would, without affecting the "general principle" therein declared—that is without affecting the "general principle" that both the ships of the United States and those of Great Britain and of all the world should pass through the canal on terms of exact equality—enable the great object to be accomplished for the benefit of the commerce of the world. There is never a suggestion anywhere, Mr. President, that the "general principle" was to have any different meaning because of our purpose to construct the canal, but everywhere are positive declarations that it should be exactly the same "general principle" as was declared in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty without impairment.

In that same letter Lansdowne inclosed a copy of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, wherein he italicizes those portions of that treaty relating to the construction of a canal "for the benefit of mankind on equal terms to all." We were a part of mankind at that time.

On April 25, 1901, Lord Pauncefote wrote from Washington to Lansdowne and inclosed a copy of the draft of the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which had been drawn by Mr. Hay, for the consideration and advice of his Government.

In a letter of August 3, 1901, Lansdowne, writing Mr. Lowther, acknowledged acceptance of the draft, and proceeds again to make known the views of his Government on several features of the new proposed treaty. Under the sixth subdivision of this letter he says:

The proposal to abrogate the Clayton-Bulwer convention is not, I think, inadmissible if it can be shown that sufficient provision is made in the new treaty for such portions of the convention as ought, in the interest of this country, to remain in force. This aspect of the case may be considered in connection with the provisions of article 1 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, which has already been quoted, and article 8 referred to in the preamble of the new treaty. Thus, in view of the permanent character of the treaty to be concluded, and of the "general principle" reaffirmed thereby as a perpetual obligation, the high contracting parties should agree that no change of sovereignty or other change of circumstance in the territory through which the canal is intended to pass shall affect such "general principle" or release the high contracting parties, or either of them, from their obligations under the treaty; and that the rules adopted as the basis of neutralization shall govern, so far as possible.

Can any unbiased and fair-minded man contend in the face of these carefully reiterated statements that these parties expected anything but the utmost good faith on the part of the United States in maintaining not a new "general principle" that would apply merely to the balance of the world but the old "general principle" which should apply both to the United States and to the balance of the world?

In view of the suggestion made by one of the Senators the other day that neutralization, as used in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, related only to conditions pertaining to war, it is proper that I should say here that it could not have had such a restricted meaning, because there is nothing in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that refers in any way to war.

The word "neutralization," as therein used, while it may possibly include, certainly has a very different significance than that suggested. The word "neutral" often carries with it the idea of mere equality. As definitions of "neutralize" we have "to counteract as, to neutralize parties in government; to neutralize efforts, opposition, and so forth. As citations that neutralize each other." This is obviously the broad sense in which that term is used in the treaty. And that sense is not only clearly indicated in the whole context of article 8, but is further evidenced by the whole history of the two countries preceding it, wherein each was taking every possible step to neutralize or counteract the effort of the other; and to have that meaning made certain in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty by clear declaration, that it did mean "equality," that treaty specifically declares that the high contracting parties, desiring to preserve and maintain the "general principle" established by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, adopt as a basis of such neutralization seven enumerated propositions, the very first one of which pertains to the equality of treatment of all vessels, thereby including equality of treatment in the definition of "general principle of neutralization."

APPLICATION OF THE RULES GOVERNING THE SUEZ CANAL.

But, Mr. President, because the treaty provides that the rules governing the Suez Canal, which were made the basis of the neutralization and which contain the provision that "the canal shall be free and open in time of war as in time of peace, to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise," and because some of the provisions governing the navigation of the Suez Canal which are cited, numbered 1 to 7, would not be applicable to a case where the Government itself owns and controls the canal, it is argued, therefore, that the words "vessels of all nations" must have been understood to mean vessels of all other nations. This in no way follows, for several reasons:

First. At the time of the adoption of the treaty—and Senators seem to forget this—it was not known definitely whether the United States or private individuals should construct the canal. Article 1 of the treaty provided that the canal might be "constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares." If the canal should be constructed by individuals or corporations, though the United States might own the stock, all of the rules numbered 1 to 5 inclusive governing the Suez Canal would be applicable to the Panama Canal. If, on the other hand, it should be constructed by the Government, then the rules would govern so far as applicable to that particular condition. It was eminently proper, therefore, that the statement should be broad enough to cover either exigency. The conditions might be different in some respects, and, therefore, to cover that very difference article 2 provided that the rules "substantially," not absolutely in every instance, should govern.

One of the most common methods of legislation is to declare that some previous legislation shall apply to another condition created by law, so far as applicable. We have in the rules concerning the navigation of the Suez Canal sought the provisions which would be entirely applicable to the Panama Canal if constructed by private individuals or corporations, and "substantially" applicable to that canal if constructed and owned by the Government itself. Undoubtedly, if this canal had been constructed by private individuals our warships passing through would have to pay just exactly the same as British warships passing through the Suez Canal. If the canal is owned by the Government, the payment by us of tolls would be equivalent to taking money out of one pocket and putting it into another, and therefore the rule would not be applicable.

Second. That this was the understanding is clearly shown by the correspondence between the two Governments concerning the modification of the old Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

In a letter of date August 3, 1901, from the Marquis of Lansdowne to Mr. Lowther, which letter was submitted to Mr. Hay, he proposed as follows:

I would therefore propose an additional article in the following terms, on the acceptance of which His Majesty's Government would probably be prepared to withdraw their objections to the formal abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer convention.

This is the proposed amendment:

In view of the permanent character of this treaty, whereby the general principle established by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention is reaffirmed, the high contracting parties hereby declare and agree that the rules laid down in the last preceding article (article 3) shall, so far as they may be applicable, govern all interoceanic communications across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and that no change of territorial sovereignty, or other change of circumstances, shall affect the general principle or the obligations of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

That, Mr. President, was the proffered amendment of the British Government, which amendment was adopted in a modified form, but with the clear understanding of both parties that it meant exactly the same thing. I especially call attention to the fact that those rules were made to govern so far as they might be applicable.

Referring to those rules further on in the same letter, the Marquis of Lansdowne says:

On the other hand—

And this is important—

I conclude that, with the above exception (which relates to fortifications), there is no intention to derogate from the principles of neutrality laid down by the rules. As to the first of these propositions I am not prepared to deny that contingencies may arise when, not only from a national point of view, but on behalf of the commerical interests of the whole world, it might be of supreme importance to the United States that they should be free to adopt measures for the defense of the canal at a moment when they were themselves engaged in hostilities.

There is a construction given by the other party not only showing that the rules were to be applicable only in cases where they could properly be applied but stating the right of our warships to have free access to and to defend the canal.

I especially call attention to the assertion that "there is no intention to derogate from the principles of neutrality laid down by these rules." Those principles, of course, are what were declared to be the "general principles" established by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. I also call attention to the admission that there might arise cases in which the rules governing the Panama Canal might consistently be varied by the United States to shield and protect this canal for the benefit of the commerce of the world. But substantially under this treaty we are bound to carry into effect its plain intendment to preserve the "general principle" established by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. We are bound to carry it into effect so far as those rules can be made applicable, and they can be made applicable in the matter of charging all privately owned vessels the same tolls. That would be applying the rules substantially to the Panama Canal.

But it is contended that when we subsequently procured our right to construct a canal across the Isthmus of Panama we agreed to exclude the vessels of Panama from the payment of tolls, and we could not therefore have understood that we were precluded from discrimination.

Mr. President, have those Senators who use this illustration stopped to consider where it will lead them? If that agreement to release the Panaman Government from the payment of tolls is to have any evidential force whatever to explain the original understanding, then it must prove that we are not bound to refrain from any discrimination between foreign vessels. If that be true, and the Panaman vessels are certainly foreign vessels, it destroys and makes nugatory every sentence in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty relating to equality of treatment even as to foreign vessels. If you are to use it as an evidential fact for one purpose, it becomes so to prove another, and would destroy every important pledge set forth in that treaty.

Of course, that agreement was in violation of the letter of the Hay-Pauncefote convention to treat all vessels of all nations equally, and you all must admit that we did agree to that. Then, why did we violate it? Because it was necessary to secure any right whatever from either the Colombian or the Panaman Government. But why did not the British Government oppose that deviation from the agreement? Because, first, it was conceded to be a part of the purchase price upon which the very right to construct the canal was obtained, and therefore the treaty in relation to that right must rest, because it was a special consideration paid that little nation for a special great privilege extended to this country to construct the canal, which all the world wished to see accomplished. Second, no nation would desire to insist upon its contractual right when it affected such an insignificant thing as the Panaman shipping interest, and when, in addition, the insistence upon the right would deprive the Government insisting of a benefit a thousandfold more valuable to it than the right surrendered. All the nations of the world were desirous of having the canal constructed.

Mr. President, I now want the understanding of those who negotiated and framed those treaties as to whether, at any stage of the discussion, there was ever a single thought that any of our ships, coastwise or otherwise, should not be bound by the general provisions of the treaty. The lips of Hay, Pauncefote, and Salisbury are forever closed. So far as I can ascertain the only two living witnesses who had full knowledge of the understanding of these parties as to the scope and intendment of the words "vessels of all nations on terms of entire equality, so there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens," are Mr. Choate, the then American ambassador to England, and Mr. White, the American chargé d'affaires at London, through whom the treaty was negotiated.

I therefore called upon both of these gentlemen by letter for their evidence of the understanding, if any, upon this great international issue. The letter of Mr. Choate, our ambassador who negotiated the treaty, who was the medium through which Mr. Hay, our Secretary of State, spoke to Landsdowne, and through whom Lansdowne spoke to Hay, is most emphatic and to the point on this great subject. His letter is as follows:

8 EAST SIXTY-THIRD STREET, March 31, 1914.

DEAR SENATOR MCCUMBER: I have your letter of March 25, in which you ask me to answer two questions in regard to the negotiation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901.

First. Was it understood by the State Departments of the two countries that the words "vessels of commerce and war of all nations" included our own vessels?

Second. Was it understood that these words also included our own vessels engaged in the coastwise trade?

I answer both of these questions most emphatically in the affirmative. The phrase quoted, "vessels of commerce and war of all nations," certainly included our own vessels, and was so understood by our own State Department and by the foreign office of Great Britain. It was understood by the same parties that these words also included our own vessels engaged in the coastwise trade.

It is true, as you intimated in your letter, that the negotiations were conducted for the most part in London by Lord Pauncefote and myself, from the time of his arrival there in August until the terms of the treaty were settled in October, he, of course, acting under the authority and direction of the secretary of state for foreign affairs, Lord Lansdowne, and I under those of our Secretary of State, Col. John Hay.

By the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, for which the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was substituted, it had been agreed that "the parties constructing or owning the same"—that is, the canal or railways—"shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments"—that is, the Governments of Great Britain and the United States—"should approve of as just and equitable, and the said canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which shall be willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford."

By article 2, clause 1, of the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, that of February 5, 1900, it was provided that "the canal shall be free and open in time of war as in time of peace to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise."

And the language used by article 3, clause 1, of the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901, that now under consideration, is as follows: "The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic."

When we came to the negotiation of this last treaty, that of 1901, there was no question that, as between the United States and Great Britain, the canal should be open to the citizens and subjects of both on equal terms, and that it should also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State that brought itself within the category prescribed. On that point there was really nothing to discuss, and in the whole course of the negotiations there was never a suggestion on either side that the words "the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations" meant anything different from the natural and obvious meaning of these words. Such language admitted of the exemption or exception of no particular kind of vessels of commerce and of war of any nation, whether of vessels engaged in foreign trade or coastwise trade, or of steam vessels or sailing vessels, or of black vessels or white vessels, or of iron vessels or wooden vessels. The parties to the negotiation tried to use terms of the meaning of which there could be no doubt or dispute, and they meant what they said and said what they meant.

It is true that in many treaties there have been specific exceptions of vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, and it would have been easy to insert it here. But nobody ever suggested that there should or could be such an exception or exemption inserted by implication in this treaty.

The exception or exemption of vessels of the United States engaged in the coastwise trade would have excepted or exempted something like five-sixths of the entire shipping of the United States (coastwise, 6,812,532 tons; foreign, 1,017,862—World Almanac for 1914, p. 176), and it is inconceivable, as it appears to me, that we should have intended, without saying a word on the subject, to except or exempt what would thus be approximately the entire shipping of the United States. Any such idea would have made the further negotiation of the treaty impossible and would have wrecked the purpose which both parties had in mind.

Of course, I submitted from time to time as the negotiations proceeded the substance of all our negotiations to our Secretary of State in dispatches and private letters, all of which, or copies of which, are, as I believe, on file in the State Department and are doubtless open to the examination of Senators. And Lord Pauncefote in like manner was in frequent communication with Lord Lansdowne or the foreign office of Great Britain, and, of course, submitted all that was said and done between us to them. So when what you refer to in your letter as the State Departments of the two countries approved and adopted the result of our work and exchanged ratifications of the treaty as it stands, they necessarily intended that the words "the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations" included our own vessels as well as those of Great Britain, and also included our own vessels engaged in the coastwise trade.

There was no kind of vessel that the words used did not include. I am not at liberty to furnish you with copies of my reports made from time to time to Col. Hay of the negotiations, but I have carefully examined them to see whether any suggestion was made on either side of the possibility of the exemption or exception of our vessels engaged in the coastwise trade and find absolutely none.

I trust that this will aid you in your argument in support of the position which I understand you to take, that the provision in the canal bill under debate that no tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States is a direct and palpable violation of the terms of the treaty.

I have read so far as accessible the arguments made thus far in the House of Representatives on the pending question, and have observed very little discussion of the question what the language of the treaty means. But the whole discussion against the proposed repeal seems to rest upon prejudice and the proposition that we ought not to submit to British dictation on the question, which is very wide of the mark.

It is impossible, in my judgment, to discuss the question fairly on the true interpretation of the treaty and come to any other conclusion than that the repeal of the exemption clause in the act is necessary out of due regard for our national honor and good faith.

Yours, very truly,

JOSEPH H. CHOATE.

HON. P. J. MCCUMBER,
United States Senate.

In a letter to Mr. White, the American chargé d'affaires, I directed my question specially as to any possible understanding which would in any way indicate an inference that our coastwise traffic might be considered outside of the terms of the treaty. His letter therefore deals more particularly with that feature of the case. He says:

1624 CRESCENT PLACE NW.,
Washington, March 23, 1914.

MY DEAR SENATOR MCCUMBER: In reply to your letter of 9th instant, which for reasons known to you only reached me three days ago, I send you the following brief account of my connection with the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and with the negotiations which subsequently took place relative to the Hay-Pauncefote treaties.

In the latter part of December, 1898, being then chargé d'affaires to Great Britain, I received instructions from Mr. Hay, who had left the London Embassy a few months previously to become Secretary of State, to approach the British Government with a view to ascertaining whether, for reasons set forth in his dispatch, it might not be possible to secure such modifications of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as would admit of our Government's taking action whereby the construction of an interoceanic canal under its auspices might be accomplished.

I, of course, lost no time in seeking an interview with the late Marquis of Salisbury, British secretary of state for foreign affairs and also prime minister, with whom on the 22d of December I had a long and interesting conversation on the subject.

That same afternoon I cabled to Mr. Hay that there seemed to be no indication of opposition, much less hostility, on the part of the British Government to the construction by us of the proposed canal, and if the latter should be available to the ships of all nations on equal terms I felt that there would be no serious difficulty in effecting an agreement satisfactory to both nations.

I should be happy to inclose copies of Mr. Secretary Hay's instructions, of my dispatch in reply, and of my cablegram aforesaid, were it not improper for me to do so without the permission of the Department of State. And, indeed, a detailed account of my interview with Lord Salisbury would unduly extend the dimensions of this letter.

Its substance was, however, that he would be unable to give an official reply to my Government's suggestions until he had given the subject careful consideration and had conferred with the board of trade and other departments of the British Government. But he gave me to understand confidentially that in his opinion it was desirable such a canal be constructed; that a work so colossal could only be carried to a successful issue by a great power, and that the United States was that power. Lord Salisbury intimated, furthermore—also in confidence—that the British Government would not, after due consideration of the question, refuse to modify such provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as stood in the way of our making the canal, provided the ships of all nations should be guaranteed the use thereof on equal terms—a condition which he strongly emphasized.

You are aware of the negotiations for a new treaty which were entered upon shortly afterwards by Mr. Hay and Lord Pauncefote, and the result thereof was the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, to certain features of which the Senate refused its approval.

The reasons for the Senate's action were for some time misunderstood in Great Britain and created a certain amount of feeling there, which reacted upon this country and caused a certain amount of tension.

During that period I crossed the ocean several times and had private conversations with a number of the leading men of both countries, with a view to explaining what each really wanted, and to doing away with the misunderstandings which had arisen in that connection. I well remember discussing the questions at issue with several of the leading Senators of that day, of whom none, save Senator LODGE, are now Members of that body; and among the many subjects touched upon I can remember no allusion whatever to the use of the canal without payment of tolls by our vessels engaged in the coasting trade.

Eventually, as you may remember, negotiations were renewed for another treaty to take the place of the one to which the Senate had objected. These negotiations were conducted for the most part in London by Mr. Choate and Lord Pauncefote, who was in England on leave of absence, and whom Lord Landsdowne, the successor of Lord Salisbury as minister of foreign affairs, had deputed to act in his behalf with regard to the details of the proposed arrangement.

I was in constant touch, as secretary of the embassy, with these negotiations; each phase of which Mr. Choate was good enough to tell me of. Indeed I was often present during their discussion of the questions at issue, which took place for the most part at the embassy; and I never heard the exemption of our coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls mentioned in any connection.

I have, furthermore, since the receipt of your letter looked carefully over the many private and confidential letters which Mr. Hay and I wrote to each other from the time that he became Secretary of State until his death. They deal fully with public affairs, both domestic and international, but among the many references to the canal treaties and other questions pertaining thereto I can find no allusion whatever to the exemption of our coastwise trading vessels from the payment of tolls.

Under these circumstances there is but one way in which I can answer the inquiry contained in your letter—"as to the understanding of Mr. Hay and Lord Pauncefote on the question of the use of the canal by vessels engaged wholly in the coastwise trade"—to wit:

(1) That the exemption of our coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls was never suggested to, nor by, anyone connected with the negotiation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaties in this country or in England;

(2) That, from the day on which I opened the negotiations with Lord Salisbury for the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty until the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the words "all nations" and "equal terms" were understood to refer to the United States as well as to all other nations, by every one of those, whether American or British, who had anything to do with the negotiations whereof the treaty last mentioned was the result.

Yours, very sincerely,

HENRY WHITE.

Hon. P. J MCCUMBER,
United States Senate.

Here we have the conclusive evidence of what Mr. Hay, Mr. Choate, Mr. White, Lord Pauncefote, Lord Lansdowne, and all those connected with the negotiations understood the treaty to mean. We have the direct assertion of both Lansdowne and Hay that "ships of all nations, on terms of equality without discrimination," was intended to mean just the same in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that it meant in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, without impairment.

But so eager are those who desire free tolls for our vessels to find some possible escape from not only the words but the understanding of the parties to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that, like the proverbial drowning man, they grasp at the slightest straw, and so they try to comfort themselves by the assertion that 11 years after the Hay-Pauncefote treaty Sir Edward Grey, secretary of state for foreign affairs of Great Britain, admitted that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty did not govern our coastwise vessels. There are three conclusive answers to that proposition:

First. The words of the treaty itself, the clear declarations of both Hay and Lansdowne, show beyond question that the inhibition of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty did cover all our vessels, and was so intended, and therefore an understanding of some one else, 11 years afterwards, as to what that treaty meant, could not possibly vary the understanding of those who made the treaty.

Second. Mr. Grey made no such admission whatever. I assume that this claim of admission is based upon the letter of July 8, 1912, delivered by Mr. A. Mitchell Innes to our Secretary of State. In a rather short note Mr. Innes declares as follows:

As to the proposal that exemption shall be given to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, a more difficult question arises. If the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic, which is reserved for United States vessels, would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken. But it appears to my Government that it would be impossible to frame regulations which would prevent the exemption from resulting, in fact, in a preference to United States shipping and consequently in an infraction of the treaty.

There is no admission whatever that our coastwise shipping is not covered by the treaty, but simply that no objection might be taken by the other party if the coastwise trade of the United States, in which no other Government can take part, could be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic would be benefited by the exemption; but, in the opinion of Mr. Innes, it would be impossible to frame regulations which would prevent the exemption from resulting, in fact, in a preference to United States shipping. There can be but one meaning to that statement. The British Government stood upon the plain declaration of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as to the equality of treatment of vessels. It did not concede that the treaty meant anything else, either as to coastwise or other vessels, but that if the trade could be so regulated that it would not violate that equality of treatment—that is, the admission that it would not violate that equality of treatment—it might be that no objection could be made.

This was but a short note delivered by Mr. Innes to Secretary Knox, and the record appears that Mr. Innes informed Mr. Knox that when the other Government had had time to consider fully the act and the memorandum a further communication would be made. This further communication was made on November 14, 1912, in a lengthy letter, in which Mr. Grey again goes over all of the history of the negotiations, calls attention to the previous agreements and understandings as to what the "vessels of all nations" was intended to mean, and, while evidencing some willingness to not insist upon contractual rights unless there was in fact an injury, he proceeds to point out the reasons why it would be impossible to frame a rule of trade exempting our coastwise vessels, which would not be detrimental to the vessels of other nations, and thereby conflict with the agreement of the parties respecting equality of treatment.

Third. If it is still insisted that the statement in the note of Mr. Innes in any way concedes our right to release our coastwise vessels and that such subsequent statement could have the slightest evidential force in determining what the original contract was, then the declaration of Mr. Gray, in which he contends with great earnestness against any such possible construction, could also be used to establish the fact that we could not so differentiate. The one statement would neutralize the other and thereby destroy the force of both, and I use the word "neutralize" as it was used in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and in no sense as pertaining to war. This letter so fully and fairly explains what both parties had fully understood the treaty to mean, and also concedes every claim which we make concerning the passing of our own transports, and so forth, that I shall ask to have it printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Without objection, that course will be pursued.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Inclosure 2.]

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS OF GREAT BRITAIN TO AMBASSADOR BRYCE.

[Handed to the Secretary of State by the British Ambassador Dec. 9, 1912.]

FOREIGN OFFICE, November 14, 1912.

SIR: Your Excellency will remember that on the 8th July, 1912, Mr. Mitchell Innes communicated to the Secretary of State the objections which His Majesty's Government entertained to the legislation relating to the Panama Canal, which was then under discussion in Congress, and that on the 27th August, after the passing of the Panama Canal act and the issue of the President's memorandum on signing it, he informed Mr. Knox that when His Majesty's Government had had time to consider fully the act and the memorandum a further communication would be made to him.

Since that date the text of the act and the memorandum of the President have received attentive consideration at the hands of His Majesty's Government. A careful study of the President's memorandum has convinced me that he has not fully appreciated the British point of view, and has misunderstood Mr. Mitchell Innes's note of the 8th July. The President argues upon the assumption that it is the intention of His Majesty's Government to place upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty an interpretation which would prevent the United States from granting subsidies to their own shipping passing through the canal, and which would place them at a disadvantage as compared with other nations. This is not the case: His Majesty's Government regard equality of all nations as the fundamental principle underlying the treaty of 1901 in the same way that it was the basis of the Suez Canal convention of 1888, and they do not seek to deprive the United States of any liberty which is open either to themselves or to any other nation; nor do they find either in the letter or in the spirit of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty any surrender by either of the contracting powers of the right to encourage its shipping or its commerce by such subsidies as it may deem expedient.

The terms of the President's memorandum render it essential that I should explain in some detail the view which His Majesty's Government take as to what is the proper interpretation of the treaty, so as to indicate the limitations which they consider it imposes upon the freedom of action of the United States, and the points in which the Panama Canal act, as enacted, infringes what His Majesty's Government hold to be their treaty rights.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty does not stand alone; it was the corollary of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850. The earlier treaty was, no doubt, superseded by it, but its general principle, as embodied in article 8, was not to be impaired. The object of the later treaty is clearly shown by its preamble; it was "to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by whatever route may be deemed expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention." It was upon that footing, and upon that footing alone, that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was superseded.

Under that treaty both parties had agreed not to obtain any exclusive control over the contemplated ship canal, but the importance of the great project was fully recognized, and therefore the construction of the canal by others was to be encouraged, and the canal when completed was to enjoy a special measure of protection on the part of both the contracting parties.

Under article 8 the two powers declared their desire, in entering into the convention, not only to accomplish a particular object but also to establish a general principle, and therefore agreed to extend their protection to any practicable transisthmian communication, either by canal or railway, and either at Tehuantepec or Panama, provided that those who constructed it should impose no other charges or conditions of traffic than the two Governments should consider just and equitable, and that the canal or railway, "being open to the subjects and citizens of Great Britain and the United States on equal terms, should also be open to the subjects of any other State which was willing to join in the guaranty of joint protection."

So long as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was in force, therefore, the position was that both parties to it had given up their power of independent action, because neither was at liberty itself to construct the canal and thereby obtain the exclusive control which such construction would confer. It is also clear that if the canal had been constructed while the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was in force, it would have been open, in accordance with article 8, to British and United States ships on equal terms, and equally clear, therefore, that the tolls leviable on such ships would have been identical.

The purpose of the United States in negotiating the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was to recover their freedom of action and obtain the right, which they had surrendered, to construct the canal themselves; this is expressed in the preamble to the treaty, but the complete liberty of action consequential upon such construction was to be limited by the maintenance of the general principle embodied in article 8 of the earlier treaty. That principle, as shown above, was one of equal treatment for both British and United States ships, and a study of the language of article 8 shows that the word "neutralization," in the preamble of the later treaty, is not there confined to belligerent operations, but refers to the system of equal rights for which article 8 provides.

If the wording of the article is examined, it will be seen that there is no mention of belligerent action in it at all. Joint protection and equal treatment are the only matters alluded to, and it is to one or both of these that neutralization must refer. Such joint protection has always been understood by His Majesty's Government to be one of the results of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of which the United States was most anxious to get rid, and they can scarcely, therefore, believe that it was such joint protection that the United States were willing to keep alive, and to which they referred in the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It certainly was not the intention of His Majesty's Government that any responsibility for the protection of the canal should attach to them in the future. Neutralization must therefore refer to the system of equal rights.

It thus appears from the preamble that the intention of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was that the United States was to recover the right to construct the trans-Isthmian Canal upon the terms that, when constructed, the canal was to be open to British and United States ships on equal terms.

The situation created was, in fact, identical with that resulting from the boundary waters treaty of 1909 between Great Britain and the United States, which provided as follows:

"The high contracting parties agree that the navigation of all navigable boundary waters shall forever continue free and open for the purposes of commerce to the inhabitants and to the ships, vessels, and boats of both countries equally, subject, however, to any laws and regulations of either country, within its own territory, not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation, and applying equally and without discrimination to the inhabitants, ships, vessels, and boats of both countries.

"It is further agreed that so long as this treaty shall remain in force this same right of navigation shall extend to the waters of Lake Michigan and to all canals connecting boundary waters and now existing, or which may hereafter be constructed on either side of the line. Either of the high contracting parties may adopt rules and regulations governing the use of such canals within its own territory, and may charge tolls for the use thereof; but all such rules and regulations and all tolls charged shall apply alike to the subjects or citizens of the high contracting parties, and they * * * shall be placed on terms of equality in the use thereof."

A similar provision, though more restricted in its scope, appears in article 27 of the treaty of Washington, 1871, and your excellency will no doubt remember how strenuously the United States protested, as a violation of equal rights, against a system which Canada had introduced of a rebate of a large portion of the tolls on certain freight on the Welland Canal, provided that such freight was taken as far as Montreal, and how in the face of that protest the system was abandoned.

The principle of equality is repeated in article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which provides that the United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of the canal certain rules, substantially as embodied in the Suez Canal convention. The first of these rules is that the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing the rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation.

The word "neutralization" is no doubt used in article 3 in the same sense as in the preamble, and implies subjection to the system of equal rights. The effect of the first rule is therefore to establish the provision, foreshadowed by the preamble and consequent on the maintenance of the principle of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, that the canal is to be open to British and United States vessels on terms of entire equality. It also embodies a promise on the part of the United States that the ships of all nations which observe the rules will be admitted to similar privileges.

The President in his memorandum treats the words "all nations" as excluding the United States. He argues that, as the United States in constructing the canal at its own cost on territory ceded to it, it has, unless it has restricted itself, an absolute right of ownership and control, including the right to allow its own commerce the use of the canal upon such terms as it sees fit, and that the only question is whether it has by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty deprived itself of the exercise of the right to pass its own commerce free or remit tolls collected for the use of the Canal. He argues that article 3 of the treaty is nothing more than a declaration of policy by the United States that the canal shall be neutral and all nations treated alike and no discrimination made against any one of them observing the rules adopted by the United States. "In other words, it was a conditional favored-nation treatment, the measure of which, in the absence of express stipulations to that effect, is not what the country gives to its own nationals, but the treatment it extends to other nations."

For the reasons they have given above His Majesty's Government believe this statement of the case to be wholly at variance with the real position. They consider that by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty the United States had surrendered the right to construct the canal, and that by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty they recovered that right upon the footing that the canal should be open to British and United States vessels upon terms of equal treatment.

The case can not be put more clearly than it was put by Mr. Hay himself, who, as Secretary of State, negotiated the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, in the full account of the negotiations which he sent to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations (see S. Doc. No. 746, 61st Cong., 3d sess.):

"These rules are adopted in the treaty with Great Britain as a consideration for getting rid of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty."

If the rules set out in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty secure to Great Britain no more than most-favored-nation treatment, the value of the consideration given for superseding the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is not apparent to His Majesty's Government. Nor is it easy to see in what way the principle of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which provides for equal treatment of British and United States ships, has been maintained.

I notice that in the course of the debate in the Senate on the Panama Canal bill the argument was used by one of the speakers that the third, fourth, and fifth rules embodied in article 3 of the treaty show that the words "all nations" can not include the United States, because, if the United States were at war, it is impossible to believe that it could be intended to be debarred by the treaty from using its own territory for revictualing its warships or landing troops.

The same point may strike others who read nothing but the text of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty itself, and I think it is therefore worth while that I should briefly show that this argument is not well founded.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 aimed at carrying out the principle of the neutralization of the Panama Canal by subjecting it to the same régime as the Suez Canal. Rules 3, 4, and 5 of article 3 of the treaty are taken almost textually from articles 4, 5, and 6 of the Suez Canal convention of 1888. At the date of the signature of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the territory on which the Isthmian Canal was to be constructed did not belong to the United States; consequently there was no need to insert in the draft treaty provisions corresponding to those in articles 10 and 13 of the Suez Canal convention, which preserve the sovereign rights of Turkey and of Egypt, and stipulate that articles 4 and 5 shall not affect the right of Turkey, as the local sovereign, and of Egypt, within the measure of her autonomy, to take such measures as may be necessary for securing the defense of Egypt and the maintenance of public order, and, in the case of Turkey, the defense of her possessions on the Red Sea.

Now that the United States has become the practical sovereign of the canal, His Majesty's Government do not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection.

For these reasons His Majesty's Government maintain that the words "all nations" in rule 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty include the United States, and that in consequence British vessels using the canal are entitled to equal treatment with those of the United States, and that the same tolls are chargeable on each.

This rule also provides that the tolls should be "just and equitable." The purpose of these words was to limit the tolls to the amount representing the fair value of the services rendered, i. e., to the interest on the capital expended and the cost of the operation and maintenance of the canal. Unless the whole volume of shipping which passes through the canal, which benefits all equally by its services, is taken into account, there are no means of determining whether the tolls chargeable upon a vessel represent that vessel's fair proportion of the current expenditure properly chargeable against the canal; that is to say, interest on the capital expended in construction and the cost of operation and maintenance. If any classes of vessels are exempted from tolls in such a way that no receipts from such ships are taken into account in the income of the canal, there is no guaranty that the vessels upon which tolls are being levied are not being made to bear more than their fair share of the upkeep. Apart altogether, therefore, from the provision in rule 1 about equality of treatment for all nations, the stipulation that the tolls shall be just and equitable, when rightly understood, entitles His Majesty's Government to demand, on behalf of British shipping, that all vessels passing through the canal, whatever their flag or their character, shall be taken into account in fixing the amount of the tolls.

The result is that any system by which particular vessels or classes of vessels were exempted from the payment of tolls would not comply with the stipulations of the treaty that the canal should be open on terms on entire equality, and that the charges should be just and equitable.

The President, in his memorandum, argues that if there is no difference, as stated in Mr. Mitchell Innes's note of the 8th of July, between charging tolls only to refund them and remitting tolls altogether, the effect is to prevent the United States from aiding its own commerce in the way that all other nations may freely do. This is not so. His Majesty's Government have no desire to place upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and interpretation which would impose upon the United States any restriction from which other nations are free, or reserve to such other nation any privilege which is denied to the United States. Equal treatment, as specified in the treaty, is all they claim.

His Majesty's Government do not question the right of the United States to grant subsidies to United States shipping generally or to any particular branches of that shipping, but it does not follow, therefore, that the United States may not be debarred by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty from granting a subsidy to certain shipping in a particular way, if the effect of the method chosen for granting such subsidy would be to impose upon British or other foreign shipping an unfair share of the burden of the upkeep of the canal or to create a discrimination in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise to prejudice rights secured to British shipping by this treaty.

If the United States exempt certain classes of ships from the payment of tolls, the result would be a form of subsidy to those vessels which His Majesty's Government consider the United States are debarred by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty from making.

It remains to consider whether the Panama Canal act in its present form conflicts with the treaty rights to which His Majesty's Government maintain they are entitled.

Under section 5 of the act the President is given, within certain defined limits, the right to fix the tolls, but no tolls are to be levied upon ships engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States, and the tolls, when based upon net registered tonnage for ships of commerce, are not to exceed $1.25 per net registered ton nor be less, other than for vessels of the United States and its citizens, than the estimated proportionate cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal. There is also an exception for the exemptions granted by article 19 of the convention with Panama of 1903.

The effect of these provisions is that vessels engaged in the coastwise trade will contribute nothing to the upkeep of the canal. Similarly vessels belonging to the Government of the Republic of Panama will, in pursuance of the treaty of 1903, contribute nothing to the upkeep of the canal. Again, in the cases where tolls are levied, the tolls in the case of ships belonging to the United States and its citizens may be fixed at a lower rate than in the case of foreign ships, and may be less than the estimated proportionate cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal.

These provisions (1) clearly conflict with the rule embodied in the principle established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of equal treatment for British and United States ships, and (2) would enable tolls to be fixed which would not be just and equitable, and would therefore not comply with rule 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

It has been argued that as the coastwise trade of the United States is confined by law to United States vessels the exemption of vessels engaged in it from the payment of tolls can not injure the interests of foreign nations. It is clear, however, that the interests of foreign nations will be seriously injured in two material respects.

In the first place the exemption will result in the cost of the working of the canal being borne wholly by foreign-going vessels, and on such vessels, therefore, will fall the whole burden of raising the revenue necessary to cover the cost of working and maintaining the canal. The possibility, therefore, of fixing the toll on such vessels at a lower figure than $1.25 per ton, or of reducing the rate below that figure at some future time, will be considerably lessened by the exemption.

In the second place, the exemption will, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, be a violation of the equal treatment secured by the treaty, as it will put the "coastwise trade" in a preferential position as regards other shipping. Coastwise trade can not be circumscribed so completely that benefits conferred upon it will not affect vessels engaged in the foreign trade. To take an example, if cargo intended for a United States port beyond the canal, either from east or west, and shipped on board a foreign ship could be sent to its destination more cheaply, through the operation of the proposed exemption, by being landed at a United States port before reaching the canal, and then sent on as coastwise trade, shippers would benefit by adopting this course in preference to sending the goods direct to their destination through the canal on board the foreign ship.

Again, although certain privileges are granted to vessels engaged in an exclusively coastwise trade, His Majesty's Government are given to understand that there is nothing in the laws of the United States which prevents any United States ship from combining foreign commerce with coastwise trade, and consequently from entering into direct competition with foreign vessels while remaining "prima facie" entitled to the privilege of free passage through the canal. Moreover, any restriction which may be deemed to be now applicable might at any time be removed by legislation or even perhaps by mere changes in the regulations.

In these and in other ways foreign shipping would be seriously handicapped, and any adverse result would fall more severely on British shipping than on that of any other nationality.

The volume of British shipping which will use the canal will in all probability be very large. Its opening will shorten by many thousands of miles the waterways between England and other portions of the British Empire, and if on the one hand it is important to the United States to encourage its mercantile marine and establish competition between coastwise traffic and transcontinental railways, it is equally important to Great Britain to secure to its shipping that just and impartial treatment to which it is entitled by treaty and in return for a promise of which it surrendered the rights which it held under the earlier convention.

There are other provisions of the Panama Canal act to which the attention of His Majesty's Government has been directed. These are contained in section 11, part of which enacts that a railway company, subject to the interstate commerce act of 1887, is prohibited from having any interest in vessels operated through the canal with which such railways may compete, and another part provides that a vessel permitted to engage in the coastwise or foreign trade of the United States is not allowed to use the canal if its owner is guilty of violating the Sherman antitrust act.

His Majesty's Government do not read this section of the act as applying to or affecting British ships, and they therefore do not feel justified in making any observations upon it. They assume that it applies only to vessels flying the flag of the United States, and that it is aimed at practices which concern only the internal trade of the United States. If this view is mistaken and the provisions are intended to apply under any circumstances to British ships, they must reserve their right to examine the matter further and to raise such contentions as may seem justified.

His Majesty's Government feel no doubt as to the correctness of their interpretation of the treaties of 1850 and 1901, and as to the validity of the rights they claim under them for British shipping, nor does there seem to them to be any room for doubt that the provisions of the Panama Canal act as to tolls conflict with the rights secured to their shipping by the treaty. But they recognize that many persons of note in the United States, whose opinions are entitled to great weight, hold that the provisions of the act do not infringe the conventional obligations by which the United States is bound, and under these circumstances they desire to state their perfect readiness to submit the question to arbitration if the Government of the United States would prefer to take this course. A reference to arbitration would be rendered unnecessary if the Government of the United States should be prepared to take such steps as would remove the objections to the act which His Majesty's Government have stated.

Knowing, as I do, full well the interest which this great undertaking has aroused in the New World and the emotion with which its opening is looked forward to by United States citizens, I wish to add before closing this dispatch that it is only with great reluctance that His Majesty's Government have felt bound to raise objection on the ground of treaty rights to the provisions of the act. Animated by an earnest desire to avoid points which might in any way prove embarrassing to the United States, His Majesty's Government have confined their objections within the narrowest possible limits and have recognized in the fullest manner the right of the United States to control the canal. They feel convinced that they may look with confidence to the Government of the United States to insure that in promoting the interests of United States shipping nothing will be done to impair the safeguards guaranteed to British shipping by treaty.

Your excellency will read this dispatch to the Secretary of State and will leave with him a copy.

I am, etc.,

E. GREY.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have stated that the Committee on Foreign Relations understood this exactly the same way, and I purpose to show that beyond any possible doubt.

COMMITTEE VIEW.

Let us see how the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate construed the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, remembering that it was upon that construction without question that the Senate voted its adoption.

To fully comprehend the construction given to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty by the Committee on Foreign Relations which reported it, it is proper, though not at all necessary, to quote the portion of the old Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which by the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty are carried into the latter, and the two or three paragraphs that were considered by the committee in making its report. I quote a portion of the old Clayton-Bulwer treaty at this point, only because it is continued in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and becomes a part of it by specific words.

Article 8 of the treaty signed in Washington on the 19th day of April, 1850, provides:

ART. 8. The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle—

Keep those two in mind—

they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified—

Now, here comes the general principle:

It is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

I only stop here to call your attention to the fact that the parties entering into that agreement desired not only to "accomplish a particular object," but also to establish a "general principle." There were two things in the minds of the contracting parties—a "particular object" and a "general principle." Now, what was the particular object to be accomplished? That particular object, Mr. President, was that neither of the two countries should construct, control, or govern an isthmian canal. Not only the treaty itself, which declares that "the Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal," but the entire history of all the negotiations, which indicate that each country was suspicious that the other might secure such control to the detriment of its citizens, left no question as to the object to be accomplished, namely, that neither the one nor the other should have a monopoly over any connecting highway between the oceans. That was the first thing to be established by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the "particular object to be accomplished."

But, Mr. President, in addition to that, the treaty was entered into to "establish a general principle." Now, what was that general principle? Here, again, we are not left to inference. That general principle is set out in clear, distinct terms in article 8, namely:

It is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same—the interoceanic communication—shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Government shall approve of as just and equitable, and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State.

In other words, the general principle was that this passage should be as free as though nature had cut the waterway, with the exception that the reasonable expenses of constructing and operating it should be borne equally by all vessels using it. This was the general principle which was carried forward into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

The preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty declares that the two parties to the convention—this was our last treaty, now—being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and, to that end, remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of April 19, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries—

And so forth.

I have already called your attention to the discussion in which the British Government asked that we put in a special clause to mean that, and Mr. Hay answered:

It is not necessary, because, under this declaration in the preamble, we can not impair those general principles.

I will pause here just long enough to call your attention to the fact that this preamble to the convention is to remove any objection to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the United States. It is not to remove the objection to the construction by the Government of Great Britain. In other words, only one party is released from that previous understanding and that is Great Britain. She surrendered a mighty right there and demanded only fair and equal treatment for her shipping in consideration of the surrender of that right. Under that contract, as I construe it, she could not construct a canal across the Isthmus of Panama although we could do so.

I also call your attention to the fact that this new agreement is to be without impairing the general principle established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

The next provision to which the report of the committee is directed, which I purpose to bring before the Senate, is paragraph 1 of article 2, which reads as follows:

1. The canal shall be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations, on terms of entire equality so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

I confess I can not see how it is possible for anyone reading these provisions to seriously contend that it was not the intention of the framers of those treaties that the words "vessels of all nations on terms of entire equality" did not include vessels of the United States. That meaning was so clear in the terms of the two treaties, which were then carefully scanned by the Senate, that there was no thought of challenging that conclusion arrived at by the committee and explained and defended on the floor of the Senate by the learned chairman, Senator Davis, and the critical and analytical mind of Senator Morgan.

The Senate presupposes, it sometimes seems to me, that the Senate at that time did not consider any of these questions. Mr. President, they considered every one of them, and they fought every one of them out on the floor wherever a question was raised.

Senator Davis in his report answers every contention that was made on the part of those who desired to free our vessels from tolls when the matter was up for consideration. He declared in concise language and asserted boldly that the United States was to obtain no other privilege than those granted to the nations of all the world. Let me quote his language:

No American statesman—

He says—

speaking with official authority or responsibility, has ever intimated that the United States would attempt to control this canal for the exclusive benefit of our Government or people. They have all, with one accord, declared that the canal was to be neutral ground in time of war, and always open, on terms of impartial equality, to the ships and commerce of the world.

What could the Senate have understood by these words: "No American statesman, speaking with official authority or responsibility, has ever intimated that the United States would attempt to control this canal for the exclusive benefit of our Government or people"?

If we control it for the exclusive benefit of our coastwise trade without equality, that is a monopoly, so far as that feature of a monopoly is to be distinguished.

Remember, he was giving a construction to that treaty, and an answer to those, few in number, who at that time wanted a free hand to do as we might wish in the matter of tolls and charges.

They have all, with one accord, declared that the canal was to be always open on terms of impartial equality to the ships and commerce of the world.

Those are the words of Mr. Davis.

Could any Senator have misinterpreted the meaning of those words, "ships and commerce of the world"? Are not coastwise ships ships of the world? Are not all our ships ships of the world?

To make this doubly clear he asserts:

Special treaties for the neutrality, impartiality, freedom, and innocent use of the two canals—

He is speaking now of both—that are to be the eastern and western gateways of commerce between the great oceans are not in keeping with the magnitude and universality of the blessings they must confer upon mankind. The subject rather belongs to the domain of international law.

He meant to contend that that waterway should be as free as though it had been a strait in the place of a canal.

"The subject belongs to the domain of international law," says Senator Davis, not domestic law; "and any other view," he declares, "taken by us is not in keeping with the magnitude and universality of the blessings they must confer upon mankind."

His report is not a mere declaration, but an argument in favor of the declaration. He then proceeds:

The leading powers of Europe recognized the importance of this subject in respect of the Suez Canal, and ordained a public international act for its neutralization that is an honor to the civilization of the age. It is the beneficent work of all Europe, and not of Great Britain alone.

Notice the analogy:

Whatever canal is built in the Isthmus of Darien will be ultimately made subject to the same law of freedom and neutrality as governs the Suez Canal, as a part of the laws of nations, and no single power will be able to resist its control.

The Senator in that report especially calls attention to our agreement to abide by the rules governing the Suez Canal, and those rules bind Great Britain, the controlling stockholder in that canal, exactly as they bind every other nation. "Whatever canal is built in the Isthmus of Darien," he asserts, "will ultimately be made subject to the same law of freedom and neutrality as governs the Suez Canal, as a part of the law of nations, and no single power will be able to resist its control."

Let us not forget that Great Britain has her Asiatic interests and possessions; but, notwithstanding her great interests on the Asiatic side, though she and her citizens own the controlling stock, she and her citizens have to pay tolls for their shipping that goes through there the same as every other vessel of the world.

Again he declares in unequivocal words—this is again the statement of Mr. Davis:

The United States can not take an attitude of opposition to the principles of the great act of October 22, 1888, without discrediting the official declarations of our Government for 50 years on the neutrality of an isthmian canal and its equal use by all nations without discrimination.

I especially call your attention to his declaration that the United States can not take an attitude of opposition to the equal use of this proposed Panama Canal by all nations without discrimination. Can anyone imagine Senator Davis, the soul of fairness, honor, and integrity, making these declarations, voicing the construction by his own Committee on Foreign Relations, carrying a secret view that all nations did not include the United States? It was so simple, so easy to put that question at rest by a simple statement; and if he had so thought or if he had believed that any member of the committee so thought, my acquaintance with Senator Davis is sufficient to justify me in the assertion that he would have brought such views to the front and had them debated out and acted upon before that treaty would have passed.

I do not think, Mr. President, that there is anyone who will contend that the treaty does not affect our coastwise trade, who can not with equal reason also contend that it does not affect our vessels engaged in foreign commerce. As a matter of fact, when the toll bill first came to the Senate in 1912 it remitted the tolls to all of our vessels, irrespective of the character of the commerce in which they were engaged. In other words, if that view were correct, we could have a monopoly so far as our own trade was concerned. Let the further declaration of that report, the foundation of all of our argument before the Senate, answer that assumption. Again he says:

To set up the selfish motive of gain by establishing a monopoly of a highway that must derive its income from the patronage of all maritime countries would be unworthy of the United States if we owned the country through which the canal is to be built.

What did he mean by the words "by establishing a monopoly" if he did not mean to negative the idea that we could release our vessels from the payment of tolls?

But, Mr. President, the report declares that the income of this great connecting waterway must be derived through the patronage of all maritime countries, and it would be unworthy of the United States to establish such a monopoly.

But, Mr. President, we have been so in the habit of assuming to dominate the affairs of this Western Continent, and especially those of our southern Republics, that we sometimes forget their sovereign rights. And lest we might so forget them in this Hay-Pauncefote treaty and the construction that should be placed upon it, the committee report calls our attention to the fact that we must deal not only with Great Britain but with the country through whose territory the canal must be constructed and operated.

I am now coming to a most vital matter in the construction of this treaty. At the time that treay was before us Nicaragua and Costa Rica were the particular countries over whose territory we expected to pass. And in the report the chairman calls attention to the fact that, independent of our treaty with Great Britain, these other countries may have treaty relations with other countries—with Great Britain, for instance—which might negative the right of even Nicaragua or Costa Rica to grant our ships of commerce an extraordinary privilege of transit through the canal. As a matter of fact, my remembrance is that Great Britain did have such treaties with these countries as prohibited them from granting privileges to vessels passing through any contemplated ship canal across their territories that would not apply also to her own ships. So that if we were to claim a construction of that treaty that would allow special privileges to our own vessels, we would at the same time make the other parties to the agreement—the other South American countries—violate their treaties in order to conform to our construction.

On this subject the report further states:

> But the location of the canal belongs to other governments, from whom we must obtain any right to construct a canal on their territory, and it is not unreasonable, if the question was new and was not involved in a subsisting treaty with Great Britain, that she should question the right of even Nicaragua and Costa Rica to grant to our ships of commerce and of war extraordinary privileges of transit through the canal.

Great Britain was in a position to say to these other countries, "You can not modify your agreements with me which I already have."

Nor did the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations or his report leave that matter to mere conjecture. He further declared—and this is what we had before us when we voted—

> It is not reasonable to suppose that Nicaragua and Costa Rica would grant to the United States the exclusive control of a canal through those States on terms less generous to the other maritime nations than those prescribed in the great act of October 22, 1888; or if we could compel them to give us such advantages over other nations, it would not be creditable to our country to accept them.

That was our position. Stop and think of the significance of that sentence. Think of Senator Davis saying that it would not be creditable to exact such advantage if the treaty under consideration gave us that advantage. Think of him asserting that the very thing we were doing would not be creditable.

That is the reasoning and the logic you will have to apply to it.

Not only does this report make it clear, as clear as it would be possible, it seems to me, to indicate a purpose, but the chairman declares that any other construction would not be creditable to our country.

No Senator ever challenged that view when it was uttered in 1900.

Mr. President, there has been a great deal said about the sentiment of the American people upon this question. They say that the sentiment is overwhelmingly in favor of free tolls. That is not true, but it is true that the sentiment of the people generally favors our right to do as we wish with a canal which we have built with our own money and which we must maintain with our own money.

The sentiment is in favor of the right; that is all. The sentiment does not ask us to break our word to maintain a right. We can get it in another way.

Very naturally the people of the United States, and especially those whose attention has not been called to the consideration which we paid for our right, would reason thus: We built that canal; we furnished every dollar that went into its construction; we must maintain it; we must protect it against all assault or interference; we practically own the territory over which it is constructed. Then, why should we not operate it in whatever manner we see fit, as freely and as fully as an individual could use his own property? That is a most natural sentiment, and we must admit that that is the prevailing sentiment of the people. But, Mr. President, that is a very different sentiment from one which would wish us to violate a great international agreement. I have enough confidence in the natural innate integrity and sense of honor of the American people to believe that whenever and wherever this country has entered into an agreement and they fully understand that we have bound ourselves they wish us to maintain the sacred honor of the country. I believe that the people would impose upon the Government the same rule of international integrity as it would upon people in their relations with each other. The great trouble is that this matter has never come fairly and fully before the public. Those who have read the treaties, those who have closely followed the arguments, are, in my opinion, overwhelmingly of the opinion that we are bound by contractual obligations to either charge all vessels of all the world exactly the same or free them exactly the same from the payment of tolls. But the very fact that the majority of the people might not understand this question and might not understand why a country owning and operating this canal should have its will impaired in any degree by the claim of any other nation ought not to deter me, who does understand the obligation that we imposed upon ourselves, for no one else imposed it upon us, from voting to uphold our national word.

But this question of rights, incidental to ownership, was fully met and explained in that same report. It is not new; it was fought out there and decided there. It was not a new question which came up after the adoption of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It was argued out on the floor of this Senate and voted out on the floor of the Senate.

On the question of the canal being built with our own money and any special right to be derived from that fact, this report further states, and I ask Senators to listen to the words:

> That our Government or our people will furnish the money to build the canal presents the single question whether it is profitable to do so. If the canal, as property, is worth more than its cost, we are not called on to divide the profits with other nations. If it is worth less and we are compelled by national necessities to build the canal, we have no right to call on other nations to make up the loss to us. In any view it is a venture that we will enter upon if it is to our interest, and if it is otherwise we will withdraw from its further consideration.
> The Suez Canal makes no discrimination in its tolls in favor of its stockholders—

> and, taking its profits or the half of them as our basis of calculation, we will never find it necessary to differentiate our rates of toll in favor of our own people in order to secure a very great profit on the investment.

There, Mr. President, is the foundation upon which we based our belief at that time that we should bind ourselves to accord the same treatment to our vessels as we should accord to the vessels of the world. Before us at that time was a schedule of rates of toll that could be charged, an estimate of the number of vessels, including our vessels engaged in foreign trade and our coastwise vessels, which would make use of the canal, and upon that we made our estimate of the value of the canal. With that explanation Senator Davis said we were to treat every nation the same as we treated our own and to rely for our compensation for our investment upon the tolls and upon the special benefit of being brought closer to our sea possessions.

Senator Davis declared in that report before the Senate that we furnished the money to build that canal as a venture; that we took the chance of whether it would be profitable or unprofitable; that we were not compelled to divide our profits with the nations of the world if it were profitable, nor to call upon the nations of the world if it did not prove a success. We believed that it would prove a success. The reports that had been made to us upon the basis of one-half of the tolls of the Suez Canal assured us that it would be a success. That calculation took into consideration tolls on our coastwise vessels.

What could the Senate have understood? What could any Senator have understood by the words: "We will never find it necessary to differentiate our rates of toll in favor of our own people in order to secure a very great profit on the investment."

Let me ask Senators candidly: Did or did not those words mean that this treaty prohibited us from differentiating between our own vessels and the vessels of other nations? If it did not so mean, then what on earth did it mean; and what did Senator Davis mean when he used those words? Can you make a declaration of construction stronger or more emphatic than these words make that construction?

No, Mr. President, we all understood; Mr. Hay understood, Lord Pauncefote understood, and the Senate of the United States understood that under the terms of this treaty we could not differentiate between our own ships and the ships of foreign countries. That declaration was the keynote of the eloquent address that was made by Senator Davis. I can not pass from his declaration without inserting his final eloquent tribute to this great project:

In time of war, as in times of peace, the commerce of the world will pass through its portals in perfect security, enriching all the nations, and we of the English-speaking peoples will either forget that this grand work has ever cost us a day of bitterness, or we will rejoice that our contentions have delayed our progress until the honor has fallen to our grand Republic to number this among our best works for the good of mankind.

For the good of mankind was our glorious boast in 1900. For the special good of ourselves and mankind be damned is the construction we seek to place upon that treaty in 1914.

I can not but feel that in our thoughtless haste the Senate, the vast majority of whom had not been Members of this body when this treaty was adopted, and without a careful consideration of the understanding of the parties to it at that time, and influenced more by a desire to voice their sentiment as to whether we should allow any other nation to challenge any right which we might desire to exercise in relation to the canal, rather than upon the question whether we had actually contracted to do so, voted their sentiment in favor of free tolls. The real question you did not consider; we know it was not considered. It was impossible at that time to get the Senate to consider the real merits of our contractual obligation. I know that, and every other Senator knows that.

There are abundant reasons for requiring every vessel that passes through that canal, no matter by whom owned, to pay its fair proportion of the tolls, independent of any treaty stipulation, so that those who do not agree with me upon the treaty could well afford upon the general principle to compel all vessels to pay their proper proportion of the cost of maintaining this canal. But, as this feature of my argument is directed toward the international obligation, I proceed further in the matter of the understanding of the Senate as to the proper construction to be placed upon that treaty.

Senator Morgan, as I have stated, submitted a minority report; and although he differed with the majority upon certain questions, that eminent scholar and historian agreed entirely with the report of the majority when he said:

The treaty under consideration is for the avowed purpose of removing any objection that may arise out of the convention of April 19, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the United States, without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention.

That general principle, as it is modified or specially defined in this treaty, is all that is left of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, as now being in continuing force.

There was no misunderstanding as to what that general principle was.

All that is left of this general treaty—

Says Senator Morgan in his report—is the general principle provided in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. That is, that the vessels of all nations using the canal should be treated with exact equality, without discrimination in favor of the vessels of any nation.

Again, Senator Morgan says:

Then this convention, in article 2, proceeds to define and formulate into an agreement, intended to be world-wide in its operation, "the general principle of neutralization," established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty on the basis of the treaty of Constantinople of October, 1888, relating to the Suez Canal.

Nothing is given to the United States in article 2 of the convention now under consideration, nor is anything denied to us that is not given or denied to all other nations.

That was the understanding with those who followed Senator Morgan in his views, and you will see how they explain and fit in with the views of those who opposed Senator Morgan's contention. You will notice how the words used by him in relation to the general principle dovetail with the words used in the treaty itself and in the old Clayton-Bulwer treaty, "on the basis of the treaty of Constantinople of October, 1888, relating to the Suez Canal," and those tolls were the same to every other nation, no matter what the ownership of the canal might be.

I have already quoted to you the words in the treaty, that the high contracting parties adopted as the basis of such neutralization the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention between Great Britain and certain other powers, signed at Constantinople, October 20, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez maritime canal—that is to say:

The canal shall be free and open in time of war as in time of peace to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subject in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

We adopted the Suez Canal regulations, which prohibited favoritism on account of coastwise or other trade.

There was inserted in the RECORD last year an article written by Mr. Feuille regarding tolls on the Panama Canal, in which he asserts that the word "neutralization" used in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty had reference only to its freedom of use and protection from warlike acts rather than tolls. And his whole argument was based upon that false assumption, because the "general principle of neutralization" established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was not left to any false construction, but the Hay-Pauncefote treaty declares what was intended by those words, and sets forth seven specific propositions that are included in the words "general principle of neutralization," the very first of which is the declaration that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. We all know that the rules provided for the operation of the Suez Canal do not exempt the shipping of any owner or stockholder, and when we adopted the Suez regulations we knew we could not claim an exemption as owner.

I have presented, Mr. President, this much of the proceedings in the Senate at the time of the adoption of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to demonstrate beyond any possible contention that the Senate as a whole, those who listened to the debate or took part in it, did comprehend, and clearly comprehend, that the treaty was being pressed for adoption upon the theory of construction that it bound the United States to claim no privileges for its own vessels of any kind that it did not accord to other vessels. Thus we have the positive, certain declarations, as set forth in the report, to establish that view beyond contention. But we need not stop there; we have the negative action of the Senate supporting the same view.

Mr. President, I was present, I think, during all of the debates on the treaty. I can not be certain that I was in the Senate Chamber every moment, but I do not now recall being absent. It was my first year in the Senate; this was a great question. I took a deep interest in it at that time, and all of the proceedings are impressed upon my mind more indelibly than anything that has happened since. And yet I never heard during all of that debate, either upon the original treaty when it first came before us or upon the modified treaty, which was afterwards agreed to by Great Britain and which came before us the second time, any contention on the floor of the Senate that the construction placed upon it by the authors of the treaty, the committee to which it was referred, were not borne out by its words. With my strong views against the remission of tolls to our vessels, either coastwise or others, I am certain that I never should have voted for that treaty had I supposed that it would have at any time been given a different construction by the Senate or the Congress of the United States. I should have insisted that it be made certain.

We not only failed to make any such claim, but by a vote of 43 to 27 we declared against the policy of freeing any of our own vessels from these tolls. Senator Bard, who represented a constituency whose great cities would be benefited by a provision for free tolls for our coastwise vessels, introduced an amendment for that purpose, as follows:

Strike out all of article 3 and substitute the following:

"ART. 3. The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect to the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade."

When he proposed that amendment did he believe this agreement gave us the authority without that amendment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Right there, I do not know whether my memory is at fault or not, but it seems to me that either Senator Morgan or Senator Money, of Mississippi, one or the other, made the objection to the treaty directly and explicitly that it did not permit us to exempt our coastwise vessels, and that, in order that it should, the third amendment must be adopted.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, can you imagine that that amendment could come up without being debated or without anything being said about it? Is it possible that the Senate did not debate that question? They did debate it, and they contended that it ought not to be a part of the treaty. That was the reason it was stricken out.

We were considering a solemn obligation between two of the greatest countries in the world—an obligation between two countries which had made louder proclamations and more persistent assertions in favor of national integrity than any other countries in the world. If we were honest it was incumbent upon us at that time to prevent either of these countries getting into a position in their contractual relations with each other where either they or the other great nations of the world could challenge their sense of national honor. If there was a misunderstanding it was the duty of every Senator, under my code of ethics, to have so declared in the open Senate and to have attempted, so far as he was able to do so, to free the instrument from any uncertainty.

Suppose I were drafting a private contract with the Senator from Colorado and there were within that contract a certain clause, and he asked me what I understood that clause to mean and I told him what I understood it to mean, and he said, "That is just what I understood it to mean, and with that understanding we will sign it." In what position would I be to come around 10 years afterwards and say, "Though we agreed as to what the construction should be, nevertheless it is open, according to its real words, to some other construction, and therefore I propose to give it a different construction"?

Believing that it was certain, Senator Bard introduced his amendment. That amendment was voted down by a vote of 43 to 27. By that vote we renounced forever a claim that we could remit these tolls.

I am well aware that some time after Senator Bard had left the Senate, and in the debates of about a year ago, some Senator introduced a letter from ex-Senator Bard, in which he stated, in substance, as I now remember it, that he thought that there were votes against his amendment on the ground that we had the right to remit the tolls without this amendment. I am very certain that he did not say that anyone ever said so, but that he thought it was voted down on that theory.

I can not believe that there were many Senators who took that position. Certainly none in the open debate, and every Senator knew that it was contrary to the general understanding of the Senate.

With the construction that was placed upon the treaty by those reporting it, it would have seemed to have been our duty, if we had had a different view, to have voted for the Bard amendment so as to make that question certain. We must either say that we did not think so, or else we must admit that we were carrying in our minds a secret conviction that we could violate that provision of our treaty, knowing that the other party to the contract held a different view. Such action on our part would, according to my view, be very far from proper international as well as individual ethics.

Mr. President, every man in the Senate to-day recognizes not only the clear legal mind of Senator Bacon but also his absolute candor in debate. He voted for the Bard amendment. He has left in no unmistakable terms what was understood by that vote. While I was discussing that question in the Senate in 1912 Senator Bacon asked permission to interrupt in support of my contention. The RECORD discloses the following:

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me, I think he could state it a little stronger than he did when he used the word "renounced."

I had stated that we renounced our claim of a right to eliminate our coastwise trade from the operations of the treaty.

Then he says:

We were then engaged in the making of a new treaty with Great Britain, and, of course, if Great Britain would have agreed to that arrangement it would have been a legitimate contract and covenant between the two. What the Senate of the United States then did was to decline even to make that demand upon Great Britain. We declined to say that we would contend for that. We not only by that action, in fact, recognized that there was an obligation of that kind under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but we declined to contend that that should be surrendered by Great Britain and that a new contract should be made, to which they would not have agreed.

I wish to say, if the Senator will pardon me a moment, in this connection, as I am one of those recorded as voting in favor of the Bard amendment, that my idea at that time was not that any part of the merchant marine of the United States should have free transportation or free right of passage through the canal, but I was standing simply upon the ground that I thought the United States should have the right to control whatever tolls were imposed and discriminate in favor of our own citizens if we saw fit to do so.

There was an honest statement of what he meant.

I do not wish myself to be considered as being committed by that vote to the principle of free passage for American ships in the canal.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I think the vote was clearly a declaration of our intent and purpose not to demand free tolls for our own coastwise trade. That is all that I am citing it for.

Mr. BACON. That would be true; and further than that, not to discriminate, that even if we charged tolls we would charge no greater tolls for the ships of foreign countries than for the ships of our own country.

Mr. Bacon gave the full truth of what the understanding of the Senate was when we voted upon the Bard amendment.

And so both affirmatively in debating the treaty and negatively in voting down an amendment to release our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls have we declared our purpose to maintain the policy of nondiscrimination which has been the continuous policy of this country for nearly a hundred years.

Remember that the South American nations have rights here as well as Great Britain and the United States. They must necessarily have more or less of a coastwise trade.

In agreeing to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty it was the purpose of the United States to place itself exactly in the same position it would have been in had the canal been constructed by France, by Nicaragua, or by any other Central American State. We claimed no special privileges, because the money represented our investment. It was believed that the tolls charged and the benefits derived specially by the United States would compensate us for the investment.

Senator Davis, in his report on the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, declared this its purposes in concise language, and asserted boldly that the United States was to obtain no other privileges than those granted to the nations of the world.

CONSIDERATION.

Back of the claim of right to free our own ships from the payment of tolls and the real basis of the claim is that we paid for the canal with our own money; that we own it and ownership should carry with it the right to do as we please. Yes; we do own it. But we bought the right to construct that canal on foreign territory, and the purchase price for the right to build and operate that canal was that we should forever maintain its neutrality and guarantee equality of treatment to the vessels of all nations. Can we now honorably claim the right and repudiate the consideration?

The importance and validity of this consideration and our moral duty to fulfill its obligations will be made more apparent as we view the conditions which preceded it. Prior to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850, two great powers were the sovereigns of all the territory of North America, except Alaska, north of the Mexican border. The proportionate importance of Canada and the United States was less striking than it is to-day. The Atlantic and Pacific coast line of Canada was even greater than that of the United States. In addition to this great British possession north of us, that country had her Caribbean possessions, the Bermudas, the Bahamas, British Guiana, British Honduras, and other islands. She also exercised a protectorate over a vast stretch of country on the eastern shore of Central America known as the Mosquito Coast. She was then in possession of the entrance to what was then regarded as the only feasible canal route across the Isthmus. Both the United States and Great Britain were interested in a communication between the two oceans for the benefit of their respective coast lines. The United States beheld Great Britain in possession of that territory which seemed to be the key to an isthmian canal. We feared, and justly feared, the control of such a connecting waterway by any foreign Government; and, therefore, the United States, not Great Britain, asked audience to the end, not that we should obtain an advantage over British rights in any canal that might connect the two oceans, but that Great Britain should not hold an advantage over us. That diplomatic audience was granted at the solicitation of our Government, and we secured just what we asked for and conceded to the other party all the rights which we asked for ourselves. That general idea of neutral rights, equality of rights, has been maintained by both nations, down until after the adoption of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

POSITION OF PREVIOUS STATE DEPARTMENT.

I am not unmindful of the position of our State Department, nor the delicacy of the situation in that department after Congress had declared for free tolls. Our Government can only speak through Congress. That body expresses and must express the supreme will of the Nation, and the State Department is the instrument through which that will must operate, so far as it relates to international matters. If we do not keep our international agreements, Congress alone is resopnsible. Hence I rather looked for this plea in abatement, which in law we call a dilatory plea, a plea that says to the other party to the contract: "While we may have violated the clear letter of the contract we have not violated its spirit, because in adjusting the tolls we have made them upon a computation which includes our coastwise vessels. We have, therefore, assumed as a national obligation the tolls which our own coastwise vessels should pay, and have added no burden to your ships, and until an injury follows the result of our action there is nothing to go to a court of arbitration. A breach of contract without injury is not actionable."

Mr. President, I do not agree with the Secretary's view upon that subject. Under modern jurisprudence we can always appeal to prevent an openly declared breach of a contract. We do not have to wait until we have suffered an injury and then depend upon collecting the damages caused by it.

Mr. President, I for one do not want to see Congress force our State Department into adopting a diplomacy which may be called shiftiness. Turkey in her desperate state may be excused if she diplomatically spars for time. A great, powerful country like this never ought to do so, and never ought to be forced to do so. We released our coastwise vessels from tolls without releasing the coastwise vessels of other nations, on the grounds that we were not bound to recognize a corresponding right of release. That was the position of Congress. That is the only position it could take as a basis for its action. And if the other party to the treaty had not protested we should have claimed an interpretation in accordance with our views by acquiescence. The thinking American people who wish us to keep our honor unassailed and unassailable do not want us to dodge the issue, but to meet it squarely.

INAPPLICABILITY TO WAR VESSELS.

Mr. President, the two countries which joined in the Hay-Pauncefote convention had for so many years declared their respective policies toward the freedom and impartial use of any ship canal, had so made that policy a part of their political history, that it was thought by both nations that the mere reiteration of that policy was sufficient to insure its continuance without going into the details of all cases which it might cover and which it might not. It was the spirit of the policy that was to govern. The rules of the Suez Canal were known by both nations, and when they declared that the rules governing the Suez Canal should govern the Panama Canal both felt that they had sufficiently particularized. That meant that war vessels of the United States or of Great Britain passing through the Panama Canal should occupy the same status as though the war vessels of those two nations should pass through the Suez Canal. It was not necessary to specifically exempt our war vessels, even though both countries knew that the spirit of the agreement would not be abrogated by allowing our own war vessels to pass without tolls, because the payment of tolls would be but idle ceremony, the taking of money from one pocket and putting it into another, so that no intelligent nation could make complaint that we did not make the actual transfer from one pocket to the other.

In the letter of Lansdowne of August 3, 1901, in the diplomatic exchange of ideas upon the proposed treaty, he says:

> I am not prepared to deny that contingencies may arise when, not only from a national point of view, but on behalf of the commercial interests of the whole world, it might be of supreme importance to the United States that they should be free to adopt measures for the defense of the canal at a time when they were themselves engaged in hostilities.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty, like any other contract which is couched in quite general terms, will cover those cases that naturally fall within its spirit and intendment, and the fact that because of its generality war vessels which are owned by the party owning the canal might pass through without the payment of tolls, the changing of money from one pocket to another, would not at all open it to the construction that all vessels of our citizens might do so.

PANAMAN EXEMPTION.

It has also been stated that we have authorized the Panaman coastwise vessels to pass through this canal free of tolls, and that the other party to this contract has made no complaint. That would signify nothing. The question whether the other party to the contract does or does not make a complaint against any immaterial infringement of the contract does not make that contract read any differently. First, that was a part of the purchase price, and well might be waived. Second, the Panaman trade is so insignificant, so immaterial, that any country in the world might waive, if they saw fit, the breach of the contract in favor of that country. Mr. President, while I believe it to be a breach of the letter of the contract it is a very unimportant one, and properly waived when we consider that without it we could not construct a canal. Third, the benefits of the favor were far more valuable than the right waived in that case; but as a matter of fact it never was expressly waived, unless you can say the failure to protest was a waiver.

Mr. President, I have shown as conclusively as language can possibly show—

First. That wholly irrespective of any preceding treaties or conventions, wholly irrespective of whether the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was or was not still in force, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty did bind us to give no preference rights to our own shipping, coastwise or foreign.

Second. That this was the construction placed upon that treaty by the Committee on Foreign Relations reporting it to the Senate, and was understood by the Senate to be the construction that the other party was placing upon it.

Third. That all of our preceding diplomatic and other national declarations pointed directly toward this construction.

Mr. President, we ought not to attempt any shifty method of getting rid of our obligations. There is always a straightforward and honorable way to do so. The changing conditions of the great countries of the world compel them for their own interest to modify their agreements. They have a right to say to the other nation to a contract: While this contract appeared to be for our interest at the time we entered into it, conditions in the world and conditions at home have so changed that we must ask for a modification of this contract or for its annulment. Then if we can not secure the annulment, if we deem that we are justified in annulling the previous contract, we have a right to say to the country that for the reasons which we have given we have abrogated the contract.

That is the way two individuals would settle the matter. That is the way that two honorable nations ought to settle the matter. While I have not changed my conviction as to the propriety of compelling all our own vessels to pay the same rates of toll that are charged to the vessels of other nations; while I do not concede that we have any moral right to evade the true meaning of a contract, we have the right of abrogation, but that abrogation should be upon due and timely notice and approached in a spirit of amity and friendliness. If we want to abrogate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty within 13 years after it has been entered into, let us proceed in the orderly and proper way to do so, just as we did when we abrogated the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. I believe if we should do that we would have no difficulty in arriving at a conclusion in reference to our coastwise vessels that would be entirely satisfactory to both nations.

Mr. President, the atmosphere about me seems to be surcharged with the element of political expediency. Personally I hate the word; but whatever justification there may ever be for deviating from the line of conviction in our ordinary political battles, the element of partisanship should never enter into our international relations. When the war drums call to arms in the defense of our national life, we should know no party. When the Commander in Chief calls upon us to uphold our national honor, party expediency is a cowardly and dastardly word, and I for one should forever refuse to follow it.

REMISSION OF TOLLS A MISTAKEN ECONOMIC POLICY.

Mr. President, with these statements I shall proceed to discuss the two propositions submitted by the President, the first of which is that the remission of tolls is a mistaken economic policy from every point of view. It had been my intention at one time to give all of the history preceding the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but that I shall leave for some other time.

Mr. President, for the second time the question of free tolls for our coastwise ships is before Congress for consideration. It is, however, before us for the first time on its merits. At least I hope, since the President has asked the Congress to consider it on its merits, we will give some earnest, honest thought to that feature of the subject, disentangled from any international question. The vote in the previous Congress was not a vote as to whether as an economic policy we should exempt our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls, but a vote to declare and put ourselves on record by that declaration that we should not concede the right of any other nation to question our authority to do so. Our vote was the declaration of Congress in answer to the protest of Great Britain that, having built the canal with our own money, we ought to exercise all the rights incident to complete ownership without hindrance or limitation. It was impossible in that debate to secure any serious consideration of the merits of the question of tolls or no tolls or to focus the thought on just what we had agreed to do. We were rather searching for a loophole of escape than for the understanding of the parties to the treaty. President Wilson has asked the Congress to consider the merits of this case. He asks the question, Why should we grant the only legally created monopoly in the United States a special privilege that is not accorded to other American shipping interests? We ought to answer that question on the merits.

While I do not for one moment concede that we were not bound under the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to extend to the coastwise trade of all other nations, whether in North or South America, the same treatment in reference to tolls that we accorded to our own coastwise vessels; while in the discussion of that treaty the report of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations left no other possible inference; while not a single Senator took the position at that time that the construction given by the department and by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations was in any way incorrect; while a motion to modify that treaty so as to authorize us to free our own vessels engaged in coastwise trade from the payment of tolls without freeing the vessels of other nations was voted down, and voted down because at that time it had never occurred to us that we wished to reverse our ancient policy and declarations with reference to an isthmian canal, nevertheless, for the purpose of avoiding that feature of the case at this point, we may admit, if you please, that we have a right to free both our coastwise vessels and our vessels engaged in foreign commerce from tolls; and, of course, if we have the right in one instance we have it in both. I now want one single, solitary, sound, economic reason why our coastwise vessels should be freed from the payment of tolls and our other vessels charged tolls.

No greater injustice can be done by law than the injustice of inequality. I say that in answer to those who preach that we ought to do justice to both, and if we can not do justice to both we ought to do it at least to one. By doing what you call justice to one, however, you exaggerate and increase the injustice to the other, and that is far worse than leaving them in the positions which they previously occupied.

I want some valid reason, then, why the vessels which have and can have no competition with any foreign vessels whatever should be voted a subsidy while the vessels which have to compete with all the world, and under most keen competition, should be left to struggle on alone.

To-day, because of this monopoly, and because we have declared that there shall be no competition with the outside world in our coastwise trade, we have all of the vessels which the coastwise commerce of the country demands, and their numbers will increase as the coastwise trade is given an impetus by the opening of the canal. On the other hand, because our vessels must compete with the more cheaply constructed and more cheaply operated vessels of other countries, less than one-tenth of all our vast foreign trade is carried in American vessels. Now, why should we extend our favors to those vessels which need no favor, while we persistently refuse to extend any support whatever to the vessels which do need it? If we are to indulge in charity at all, why should we not indulge in it in a way that will help those who are in need of it?

The reason why we have done this is plain. The vote of the Senate in the remission of tolls to our coastwise vessels did not reflect in any sense the careful discrimination between these two classes of vessels which ought to have governed us. But its very purpose was to bring the question of the construction of that treaty to the front, and, before the canal should be opened, to give the treaty a construction so that all nations would understand before the opening of the canal that we would maintain the position that the words "the vessels of all nations," used in that treaty, should not include our own vessels. That is what we said. We wanted to see if such a claim would be resisted.

But independent of that keen desire to give the treaty such a construction was the fact that the American people had evidenced great hostility against any ship subsidy. That sentiment had been so powerful that for years Congress had defeated every subsidy bill before it.

So it was thought by many that we might obtain this special benefit by an indirect method, that though the people would not allow us to grant ship subsidies, they might allow us to accomplish indirectly what they would not allow us to do directly; and so back of this sentiment for undisputed right of control we worked out a subsidy scheme for the vessels that did not need a subsidy.

Do the American people understand to-day that by the law which we lately passed remitting tolls to our vessels engaged in coastwise trade they have been tricked into granting a subsidy, not to American ships that need protection, but to the coastwise ships that have no competition and therefore can not possibly need it?

Secretary Knox stated that the remission of these tolls was a subsidy pure and simple, and it is a subsidy pure and simple, to be paid by the American people. And for whose benefit? For the benefit of this great American monopoly. No one claims or can claim that the people generally will be benefited by this free gift of millions of dollars to the only legalized monopoly in the United States.

If the Government were to build a railroad from New York to San Francisco and enter into any agreement with the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. that it would keep that road in perpetual repair and order, maintain all necessary terminals at its own expense, and turn it over to the use of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. free of all rent or charge, but that no other railway company which might desire to take shipments from coast to coast would be allowed to run a train over it without paying the interest and maintenance cost, the country would be shocked. And yet that is just exactly what we are proposing to do for the benefit of the coastwise shipping corporations.

Of course, I can understand why a few ambitious cities on the coast would like to have special advantages in freight rates over all the interior points. In other words, I can understand how they would like to have the Government pay the freight for their special benefit and tax the rest of the people to pay for it. And I can understand the pressure brought to bear upon Senators who represent those cities, and that they naturally imbibe the sentiment of the people whom they represent. But I certainly can not understand how those who represent the vast interior, which would receive no benefit whatever, but, on the contrary, must suffer not only for the benefit of a few coast cities in the payment of extra taxes to maintain the canal, but must necessarily suffer in the end in higher intermediate freight rates which will be necessary to make up the losses which the great transcontinental lines will suffer in the reduction of through rates to compete with water transportation from one ocean to the other, should desire free tolls.

The only reason that I have heard in favor of the domestic policy of freeing our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls is that they may, with no cost to themselves, force the transcontinental lines into making lower freight rates from ocean to ocean; that we shall pay that cost. We might make the same deal with one transcontinental road, and for just as good a reason.

The first question which naturally arises is this: Is it necessary for us to purchase indemnity from improper freight charges if they exist? Does this great Government, which has complete control over transcontinental freight rates, have to ransom itself from piracy? The Senator from Kansas thinks it does. I do not.

The Senator from Iowa says my contention that the Interstate Commerce Commission has sufficient power to insure just rates would justify me in a view that all the great lines of railways might be properly consolidated. It leads into no such conclusion. Of course, naturally, competitive lines would relieve the Interstate Commerce Commission from the same degree of diligence that otherwise might be required of it in maintaining reasonable rates. But the Interstate Commerce Commission has the power, full and complete, and therefore the Government does not hire a competitor.

Section 15 of the act to regulate commerce provides:

> That whenever * * * the commission [Interstate Commerce Commission] shall be of opinion that any individual or joint rates or charges whatsoever demanded, charged, or collected by any common carrier or carriers subject to the provisions of this act for the transportation of persons or property * * * are unjust or unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this act, the commission is hereby authorized and empowered to determine and prescribe what will be the just and reasonable individual or joint rate or rates, charge or charges to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged.

Congress has the power to compel every road doing an interstate business to be fair, just, and reasonable in its charges. Is there a single Senator who denies that power? Congress has created a great commission whose sole duty is to investigate the question of freight rates and charges and to compel every transcontinental road to make its rates reasonable and fair. Has the Interstate Commerce Commission failed to perform its duty? If so, wherein has it failed? Are the rates at the present time from New York to San Francisco excessive? If they are, then that great commission is not performing its duty. If they are, then it is the duty of any person having knowledge of that fact to bring it to the attention of this great commission. I have a right to assume that no one expects that any of these great lines shall run its business, carrying freight from any one point to another point, at a loss. I assume, further, that everyone here is willing that such companies should have reasonable profit on their shipment from any one point to another point. I assume that the Interstate Commerce Commission has the power, and has exercised that power, and will continue to exercise it, to compel every such railway to conform to those just charges. If that is true, and I challenge any Senator to deny it and to bring to the attention of the Senate and to the attention of the Interstate Commerce Commission any instance in which it is not true, then why it is necessary for the Government to spend millions of dollars to hire another company using an all-water route to act as a check against immoderate transcontinental freight charges? The position to me is not less ridiculous than it would be for the Government to build a railroad, as I have suggested, for the Pennsylvania line, equip it, and operate it free of expense so as to allow that line to run trains from New York to San Francisco, and to charge such freights as would compel all other lines to reduce their rates.

Mr. President, every Senator here knows that this unequal, unjust, almost ridiculous method is not at all necessary. He further knows that even with a toll of $1.25 per measured ton railroad transportation can not compete with water transportation on most lines of merchandise from ocean to ocean.

The ocean-carrying toll of $1.25 a ton will carry everything that they can carry properly from one ocean to the other, and the transcontinental lines will be compelled to carry those things which the great ocean freighters can not as well carry.

But, suppose by the remission of tolls to the coastwise trade vessels you succeed in compelling the transcontinental lines to lower freight rates between coast cities on the Atlantic and on the Pacific. What would be the result upon freight rates in all the intermediate points? A railroad must be operated so as to pay all of its expenses in labor, salaries, repairs, interest on bonds, and a reasonable dividend on its stock. It is the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to see that it is so operated. Now, the earnings to pay those expenses and dividends must come from its business, and it must come out of all of its business from one end of the line to the other, must be paid by the people all along its line. And if you reduce its earnings on its shipments from coast to coast to any extent, it must make up those earnings upon its interior shipments by advancing its freight rates between all interior points. In fact, it would be invited to do that. Thus not only must the people in the interior pay in the first instance the taxes for the maintenance of this ship canal used without charge by coastwise vessels, but it must in addition pay a higher price upon every article freighted from one interior point to another.

Senators can not be unaware of the Atlantic seaboard cases which were submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission for arbitration some dozen years ago. This case involved freight charges from what is known as the Chicago district, which would take in the greater portion of the States immediately surrounding Chicago and the terminals of New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and Baltimore. This case was most important, because for the first time the commission was called upon to determine the propriety and feasibility of a mileage tariff rate. The commission soon found that to be wholly impracticable, and so they entered an order compelling the rates either to be raised at one of these terminals or lowered at another, the purpose being to balance the shipments over all of the lines so as to give each one what the commission considered its proper proportion of the carrying trade under all the circumstances. The case is of special importance, because of the reasons which were given for the decision. The chairman of the commission, speaking for that body, in substance stated that not only were the terminals—the Chicago district and these Atlantic cities—interested in the question, but that every little town along every line of those railways was also as deeply interested; that freight rates must necessarily depend upon the volume of business; and that if rates from Chicago to Baltimore over the shorter route were sufficiently low to take all of the shipments of grain or meat or other merchandise for export, it would so decrease the volume of business on the other roads as to add to the cost per ton of transportation; and if the other roads, which were compelled to haul a longer distance, were also compelled to meet the Baltimore rate, they would have to make it up in the intermediate business by charging higher rates between intermediate points. And so the commission arrived at the only conclusion that it could arrive at, that these roads must be so operated as to do justice to themselves and to all of the people served by them along the entire route.

By this proposition to free the coastwise vessels of all toll charges, Congress is attempting to do that very thing which the Interstate Commerce Commission ruled could not be done without injustice to all the people of the interior. An analogy is sought to be drawn between the free use of our ports and harbors and navigable rivers, paid for by the people generally, and the free use of the canal connecting the oceans at the Isthmus of Panama, some two or three thousand miles distant. While there is no analogy whatever, the assertion of the analogy kills the argument in favor of free tolls. Our harbors are free to the shipping of the whole world. Our harbors are free to both our coastwise and foreign trade vessels. We do not discriminate between any vessels. To charge our vessels engaged in foreign trade for using our ports and giving free use of them to our coastwise vessels would be the same wrong and unjust discrimination you are committing by granting our coastwise vessels free tolls. There might be some justification for discriminating in favor of our vessels engaged in foreign commerce which must compete with the carrying trade and subsidized vessels of the world, but never in favor of those vessels which have no foreign competition. They should all be free alike, or they should all pay alike.

Mr. President, in closing I can not but feel, and deeply feel, that this is not a mere question of dollars and cents. The matter of the payment of these tolls is a bagatelle; but we can not measure national integrity in dollars and cents. We can throw our dollars to the winds, but we can not throw national character to the winds. The President of the United States has taken a lofty stand in this case, and no matter whether we be Democrats or Republicans we ought to stand by him in his effort to uphold the national integrity of this Government in the eyes of the whole world.

You talk to us about our surrendering our authority over our domestic concerns. Mr. President, we never make an agreement with any other nation that we do not surrender some of our domestic rights. The reason for entering into an agreement is that one nation has rights which the other nation desires it should not exercise, and in consideration of that there is requested of the other nation that it yield some of its authority over its own domestic concerns.

We are surrendering nothing more than we surrender when we make an agreement that gives to the trade of one nation the same rights in our country that we give to the others. Every "favored-nation" clause in our treaties is yielding a domestic right; we are surrendering a right over our internal affairs. Every reciprocity agreement made in relation to tariffs or any other matter is an agreement whereby for a just and valuable consideration we in turn surrender some other consideration—some domestic right.

I can not imagine, Mr. President, how any Senator in this Chamber who will read the history that precedes the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, who will read the Clayton-Bulwer treaty following our declarations, and who will then read the declarations of this Government in all its statements from that time down to 1901, can for one moment question our great national policy of equality of treatment of all vessels which might use that canal. Then when we come down to the conditions, the views of both Governments at the time we entered into the great obligation known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, when we stop and read the declaration of the British press and the declaration of the American press that coincide exactly, showing that the views of the two nations have never changed in the slightest degree, when we follow that up with the declaration of our negotiators that I have given you here to-day, in which they declare over and over again that the general principles of neutrality enunciated in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty should not be violated or impaired by this Government, and when we follow that up by the declarations that are shown in the letters which I have asked to have printed as a part of this record—I say I can not conceive the possibility of any man's mind being so everlastingly prejudiced that he will close it to all this clear unmistakable evidence of what they and we all understood this treaty to mean, and insist that notwithstanding all this we can read the treaty another way. Our duty is to read that treaty the way the parties understood it to mean when they signed it.

The President of the United States, after due deliberation, and it may be contrary to his first view, has come to a conclusion, and a conclusion that he could not escape, that the honor and integrity of this country before the civilized world is at stake; and it is the duty of the American people to stand by him and keep that Old Flag flying without one single stain of dishonor. I for one purpose to stand by him. [Applause in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule of the United States Senate prohibits manifestations of approval or disapproval upon the part of occupants of the galleries. They must not be repeated or the galleries will be cleared.

During the delivery of Mr. McCUMBER's speech,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENYON in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 156, relative to expenditures for telegrams sent by Senators.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside until I complete this address.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let it be laid aside until the Senator from North Dakota finishes his address.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

After the conclusion of Mr. McCUMBER's speech,

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in yesterday's edition of the New York Times there appeared an article from the pen of Prof. Albert Bushnell Hart, entitled "Huerta not entitled to recognition." It gives a great many facts and, to my mind, a great many arguments in support of the position taken by the administration in Mexican affairs. I ask unanimous consent to have it incorporated as a part of the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Times, Sunday, April 5, 1914.]

HUERTA NOT ENTITLED TO RECOGNITION, SAYS PROF. HART—NOTED PROFESSOR OF GOVERNMENT AT HARVARD TAKES ISSUE WITH COL. GEORGE P. HARVEY ON THE MEXICAN SITUATION AND STRONGLY SUPPORTS THE PRESIDENT.

(By Prof. Albert Bushnell Hart, of Harvard University.)

Three years have passed since the Mexican volcano began to rumble and to steam and to quake, preparatory to one of its old-fashioned eruptions. Then came an explosion which blew the existing Diaz Government into kingdom gone. Another crash pulverized the Madero régime.

Forthwith lava began to flow from the northern craters of Chihuahua and Juarez. The nations of the earth crowded out upon their housetops to see the sublime spectacle, and red-hot stones fell even across the Texan border.

The lives and property of foreigners were not respected by this lawless eruption. American citizens and American investments have perished, and the American people feel that something ought to be done to check the lava and soothe the earthquake. Why have we such solid national institutions as an administration, a State Department, and a North American Review, if American mines and oil tanks can be destroyed and American citizens be massacred?

And for the last 12 months a chorus has been rising with the force and steadiness of "We Want Teddy!" at a Progressive convention. That cry is "Recognize Huerta! Recognize Huerta! Recognize Huerta!" Col. Harvey, as chief of the cheering section, still waves and gives in undertone: "Put the umpire out."

He assures us that the umpire is a well-meaning man, whose only defect of character is that he does not read the morning papers. But who knows how long Col. Harvey can restrain the American people from marching to the White House, doing the grapevine all the way, to the cadence of "Recognize Huerta! Recognize Huerta! Recognize Huerta!"

MANY FROM MISSOURI.

There is, however, a considerable section of the American people who occupy neither of the two responsible positions of chief magistrate or chief journalist who feel that a situation so difficult and so tense as that in Mexico can not be defeated by a patent war cry.

This common people is made up of Missourians, who not only want to be shown, but demand to be shown. They ask why the recognition of a particular despot should save Mexico, when the recognition of 20 of his predecessors did not stop the anarchy and misrule of that unhappy country. They suspect that the trouble is bigger than Huerta or Madero or Diaz, that it lies in the character of those whom Col. Harvey so fitly describes as "the grief-stricken people of bleeding Mexico."

A critical point which Col. Harvey overlooks is that the Mexicans were grief stricken and bleeding long before Huerta was born.

In the 93 years since the Mexican Nation first appeared, in 1821, there have been at least 200 so-called revolutions, mostly local, and 30 violent overthrowals of the national Government. Never but twice, once in the fifties and again in 1911, has there been any appeal to a general popular election, with an unrestricted use of the ballot by those who chose to vote. The present situation of Mexico is not abnormal, not something to be set aside by diplomacy or tact or proclamations or a brilliant magazine article, or by shouting "Recognize Huerta!" This is the normal condition of Mexico, which is likely to continue decades after Huerta is gathered to his victims.

The plain uninstructed American public objects to the misconception on this point caused by the 30 years of apparent peace, order, and good government under Diaz. That man came to power by the usual process of murder and treachery. His régime was one of military despotism. He had genius which showed itself in several first-class governmental conceptions. One was that of hiring the brigands as "rurales"; another that of building railroads which could carry troops to the scene of revolts; another that of sharing on a pro rata basis with some of the foreign concessionaires. We admire him as we admire Boss Croker or Louis Napoleon or Abdul Hamid—not as models for American voters, but as crude elemental forces, as men who sincerely believe that the best government in the world is that in which they ride on horseback over the bodies of their fellow men.

DIAZ'S SHORTCOMINGS.

Diaz understood that a quiet, thriving country was best for those who handled its finances. But what did he do to raise the conditions or standards of his people? Did he raise as many millions for public schools as went into his private fortune? Did he teach ideas of economy and saving? Did he attack the inhuman system of peonage? Did he gradually lead the Mexican people to share in their own Government? Did he encourage able men to take responsibility in public affairs?

On the contrary, anybody who chooses may satisfy himself that Diaz kept himself in power only by silencing those who ventured to criticize his Government. Important men were banished or reduced to impotence; less significant men went to prison, and some literally went to the wall. The most that can be said for Diaz's Government is that he returned to the public a larger fraction of its annual contribution for the support of Government than was given by most of his predecessors. He was not so greedy as Santa Ana nor so cruel as Iturbide, but he made a lot of money out of his Mexican business.

The American public has an unconquerable belief that dictators, self-appointed and supported by paid armies, have never in the history of mankind furnished a genuinely good government. The tyrants of ancient Syracuse, the podestas of medieval Italian cities, the Sultans of Persia, the Czar of all the Russias, have lived and apparently flourished; but the despot is a vampire who must always have fresh blood.

WHY HUERTA?

"What was your complaint of the Ottoman Government?" I asked a few months ago of a Bulgarian gentleman who as a boy had lived under the Turkish dispensation. "What was our complaint? That they crushed us to the earth; that whenever a young man arose who might conceivably become the leader of his people, that young man was rooted out." Woe to the country in which the ruler's policy is that of the East Indian monarchs, each of whom as he succeeded to the throne began by putting out the eyes of his younger brothers.

"Recognize Huerta?" What are the guaranties that if recognized Huerta will bear himself as a ruler? Has past experience prepared him? The uninstructed public believes that Gen. Huerta is too little of a general and too much of a cutthroat. He first appears in history as a military officer in the army of Diaz, without any reputation as a statesman or a military man, or a power in the community, that leaked outside the boundaries of his own country. He came forward in the campaign northward from Torreon to Juarez February 18, 1913, as a leader of the armies of President Madero. Then he used his authority over part of the troops to depose and imprison President Madero, who had given him his dignity and opportunity. At once he applied for diplomatic recognition, which was accorded by most of the powers of Europe. The next mark of surpassing greatness was the murder of his former friend and principal.

The tale of that transaction as related by this powerful chieftain, so brave, so magnanimous, so patriotic, is that he sent his predecessor, who was a helpless captive in his hands, from one prison to another at night, with an escort so slender that when the cortege was attacked it was unable to protect its prisoner, and he was consequently shot by his friends. The "strong man," the fighter, the leader for 15,000,000 people, takes refuge from the obvious charge of murder behind the plea that he was so inept an administrator and so timorous a commander that he could not secure the safety of a state prisoner nor obedience to his orders by his most trusted troops within a mile of his own palace.

The next evidence of statesmanship was in October, 1913, when a senator of the Mexican Republic, who at least had gone through the forms of popular election, was seized by the orders of the head of that State, who was so powerful that he felt his Government could not survive a public criticism by a fellow citizen. Then he imprisoned 110 members of congress because his policy was so clearly for the interest and happiness of his country that he could not allow any of the 110 to express his mind in opposition.

Somehow the uninstructed American public looks upon Huerta as a legitimate descendant of 20 previous dictators of Mexico—false to his friends, cruel to his enemies, and cowering before the fear that his countrymen might be aroused to depose him. Even such men frequently have the animal attribute of personal belligerency and the willingness to risk their lives for the defense of their rule. Santa Ana, one of the most slippery and contemptible of all Mexican tyrants, commanded two armies which measured swords with the American forces; but where has Gen. Huerta been during the fierce campaigns in the north? Town after town under his protection has been taken by forces of Mexicans which were little better than organized brigands; and Gen. Huerta has remained serenely in his capital.

In the last four days the city of Torreon, the gateway to the City of Mexico, has been besieged and battered, and the military President of the Republic has not stirred to animate his own troops or to share their danger. Cæsar, Frederick the Great, Napoleon, Bolivar, found time in the intervals of statecraft to lead armies to victory. Somehow the uninstructed think President Huerta as a roi fainéant, one of the kind of military commanders who send others where they dare not go.

Every such dictator in Mexico has always had to suffer from the counter dictators who have felt that they possessed the same gifts of superb courage, ability to attract the unquestioning support of the country and patriotic character which enables them to dispense with ordinary humanity.

DAMNATION OR PERDITION?

Huerta is confronting the usual opposition to Presidents of Mexico. Between the federals and the constitutionalists the American people perceive only the chance offered to his congregation by the colored minister: "Oh, my hearers, do you realize that there is stretching before you at this moment two roads? One of those roads leads to eternal damnation and the other to everlasting perdition. Oh, my hearers, which road will you choose?"

The principal rival chieftain to Huerta is Carranza, who to the ordinary observer seems to be animated with Huerta's desperate determination that other men shall fight and die, and who never gets into the thick of the fight, or even into the thin of the fight for that matter. He has left the conduct of the campaign to Gen. Villa—a man who combines the lofty qualities of a professed bandit and train robber, a safe breaker, and a captor of a nunnery; a man who habitually, deliberately, and in cold blood kills fellow Mexicans who have opposed him, musket in hand like men, and who have surrendered.

There is no use in mincing words. In international law, in ordinary morals, in the sight of Almighty God, that shocking business is nothing else but plain, despicable murder—murder without any military advantage; murder for the sake of killing. One of his latest achievements has been to order the homicide of 200 men who had thrown down their arms, on the plea that unless he shot them they would form up again, automatically arm themselves, and attack him in the rear.

Villa's plea is that of the bulldog, that he must eat the rabbit because otherwise that animal will bite his tail off. He has as much capacity for civilized government as a bull in a ring. The plain American people have just the same aversion for Villa that they have for Huerta, or for any other man who seizes upon power in order that he may benefit himself and massacre his enemies.

A SAFE RULE.

In international law it is a safe rule that every government which actually represents a nation is entitled to recognition and to diplomatic intercourse. But amid the dust and gore of Mexico it is difficult to distinguish a figure which seems to deserve official recognition by the United States of America.

The personal character of Huerta or of Villa is a factor in forming a judgment as to the realities of the Mexican situation, but ought not to be a determining reason for refusing to recognize one or the other. Our Government has never been oversolicitous about the private character of the heads of other Governments. In 1846 the eel-like Santa Ana was given a safe conduct back into Mexico so that he might make himself dictator again. King Peter of Servia was recognized by the United States, though he could qualify for the finals in a contest for a cup to the most depraved sovereign. Possibly he set an example to Huerta, since he came to the throne by murdering his predecessor.

The palpable and sufficient reason for not recognizing Huerta as President of the Mexican Republic is that he has never given evidence of being President of the Mexican Republic or that he is the choice of the Mexican nation for any office or dignity. Who declared him to be "provisional President" on February 19, 1913? Gen. Victoriano Huerta. Who proclaimed him to be "provisional but constitutional President" on February 27? Gen. Victoriano Huerta. How did the vacancy occur in the office of constitutional President? Through the assassination of President Madero and Vice President Suarez, while in the custody of men acting under the orders of Gen. Victoriano Huerta. Who profited by this crime, and thereby made himself at best (or at worst) an accessory after the fact? Victoriano Huerta. Who has arrested people who questioned his title, imprisoned, banished, or executed, right and left? Victoriano Huerta. Who dissolved the coordinate legislative branch of the Mexican Government? Victoriano Huerta. By whose direction have taxes and forced loans been made? That of Victoriano Huerta. If the question were that of recognizing a newly created nation of Victoriano Huerta, by its sister power the United States of America, the case would be absolutely complete; every person, corporation, entity, and unit of Government, comprehended within the broad term "Victoriano Huerta," is unanimous in placing the entire public authority in the hands of Victoriano Huerta.

Hence, the only question of international law and practice which the Department of State has been called upon to decide is whether the man who calls himself President of Mexico is either de jure or de facto the President of Mexico. Geographically, he is plainly not the President of all Mexico, for at least a third of its area is outside of his authority. From a military point of view he is not the head of the Mexican Republic, because his forces have been defeated by rebel armies in every pitched battle for many months. Constitutionally he is not President of Mexico, for he should be flanked by a Congress chosen in an open election. As the wielder of supreme authority for the time being he is not entitled to recognition, because he is visibly afraid to leave his capital even to defend his Government against armed enemies.

He makes the plea that all he needs to secure his power is recognition by the United States. What better proof could there be that his power is feeble, unstable, and temporary? The United States of America in 1781 did not need the recognition of our neighbor Spain to assure it of continuance; it was independent because it was really independent. From 1821 to 1826 Mexico lacked the recognition of Great Britain, yet was undoubtedly independent. When Louis Napoleon became Emperor of the French in 1861 he was not dependent on the recognition of Austria, but on the acceptance of his rule by France, which clearly wanted him, whatever his character and whatever the misfortune into which he later plunged his country.

HAGENBECK FOR MEXICO.

As against the heroes of the north, there is something to be said for the hero of the south as an organizer. The most frequent plea for the recognition of Huerta is that he is "the strong man," who, if recognized by the United States, will bring about order and good government. Of course, if he is not strong enough to recover the north, it is hard to believe that he will long hold the south. And what do people mean by "a strong man" in Mexico? To the uninstructed mind the phrase recalls Porfirio Diaz.

The success of Diaz's methods at their best is to be judged by the final outcome of his régime. What is the use of a strong man who, with all his army and finances and prestige, is at last obliged to flee his native country because he has taught his countrymen to abominate him? If by a strong man we mean one who can by brute force compel 15,000,000 people to obey him against their will, the man for President of Mexico is evidently not Huerta, but Hagenbeck, the lion tamer, with his whip and a revolver to encourage his loving subjects.

Doubtless many people are led to believe that Huerta is the Government of Mexico, because he occupies the national capital, gives orders to an army, and is supported by his troops so long as he is able to pay the price. After Gen. Miramon in 1858 became "President substitute" and was recognized by most of the European powers, Secretary Cass instructed Minister McLean that possession of the Mexican capital was not an essential condition of the recognition of the Government; that he should recognize no Government unless it was "obeyed over a large majority of the country, and the people, and was likely to continue." President Buchanan thought that since Miramon "was himself a military usurper, having expelled the constitutional President from office, it would have been a lasting disgrace to the Mexican people had they tamely submitted to the yoke."

WHY RECOGNIZE ANYBODY?

The truth is that there is no constitutional or international reason why anybody must be recognized in Mexico. It would have been well had earlier administrations been less hasty in recognizing dictators whose career was destined to be short. If there are two organizations in Mexico, neither of which can show any proof that it is desired by the Mexican people, the obvious common-sense course would seem to be to recognize neither of them. As Lincoln said in his famous speech in Chicago about slavery:

"I protest now and forever against that counterfeit logic which presumes that because I do not want a negro woman for a slave, I do necessarily want her for a wife. My understanding is that I need not have her for either; but as God made us separate, we can leave one another alone, and do to one another much good thereby."

Is there a Mexican people? Is there a popular will? Is there any known means of determining that will? That is, of course, the radical issue for Mexico and the Mexicans. The prospect of a genuinely popular government is discouraging. Apparently most of the Mexican people would accept a just and moderate Government which was once firmly seated, but, with the single exception of Diaz, the "strong men" have never furnished anything approaching a just and moderate government, certainly not Huerta.

Our American despots are satisfied with the actual control of conventions, legislatures, governors, and parties; but the Mexican wants all that and, in addition, a cocked hat, saber, presidential palace, and bullet-proof automobile. We are not too far from the ordinary habits of Mexican life; bandits have recently attacked railroad trains in Massachusetts and Illinois, and a candidate for the governorship of a Southwestern State seems to rest his claims on the fact that he served a term in prison for being captain of brigands. But the American people have the habit of accepting a defeat in a political election, cordially recognizing the candidates elected by the other party, and then organizing to defeat them at the next election. Such patience and forbearance seem lacking in the Mexican character; with them it is rule or ruin. So long as recognition waits upon the existence of a stable government, it may have long to wait.

And there is a positive and pressing need for official understanding with some authority in Mexico, because the property and lives of foreigners, including many American citizens, are in daily danger. Some of that property arises from questionable dealings with defunct governments; much of it is fairly and honestly won against great difficulties. Most of the Americans who have established themselves in Mexico did so under a government which seemed likely to retain its authority and keep the peace. Our Government owes to those people moral support at all times, and protection in case of need. Of course, that protection can be offered without recognition of this or that Mexican Government, and it is difficult to see how a constitutional president who can not defend the lives and property of his own adherents in the north, could, by recognition, become suddenly powerful enough to defend Americans.

The main difficulty is not dependent on recognition, nor even on the weakness of Mexican government, but in an instability of Mexican character, which seems to make good government impossible. Leaving the Diaz administration out of account, no government in Mexico has ever been much aided by American recognition, or much marred by the lack of it.

WHAT IS TO BE DONE?

Then, what is to be done? How is the United States to protect its nationals, or to make effective those claims for millions of dollars which will soon come pouring in and which in the last resort will have to be paid by the Mexican taxpayer? Failing recognition, intervention has been demanded. If by intervention is meant the military occupation of Mexico, with a view to the pacification of the country and then the withdrawal of troops, there have been some experiences that seem like precedents. A military force was sent to Paraguay in 1859 and to China in 1900. But Buchanan vainly sought from Congress in 1859 authority to send an army into Mexico to break up the Miramon government, and thus open the way for the Juarez government. Even when the French were in Mexico, no American troops ever crossed the border.

It seems tolerably clear that any American expedition would forthwith bring about some approach to a real national government by making every decent Mexican ready to meet the Americans, as Tom Corwin put it in 1846, "to welcome them with bloody hands to hospitable graves." For, strange as it may seem, the Mexicans, who have never learned how to develop the resources of their country or to give it dignity among nations, have an inveterate love of their own land, a furious hatred of those who attempt to diminish their territory, and a willingness to die in its defense, which, among more highly organized nations, might be called patriotism.

Allowing that intervention should begin, when and how is it to end? That is a question of more significance to us than to the Mexicans. Excellent military authorities think that a force of 200,000 men would not be too large for the purpose, which would be by far the largest army ever moved from one country to another in America. And when would that country be ready to take care of itself again? Sixteen years we have been civilizing the Filipinos up to the point where they are unanimous only on one thing, namely, that they want us to leave. Nothing less than a similar experience of education in language, science, and self-government would much affect the disposition of the Mexican people.

WE HAVE ENOUGH TROUBLE NOW.

Supposing that our physical means are sufficient for the task of holding down Mexico, have we not sufficient race and color questions already? Are we so far advanced in the amalgamation of European races, much nearer to us than the Mexicans are in culture and standards, that we can undertake a similar task at long range upon an unwilling people? Is Cuba so certain to remain a dependency instead of to become an integral part of the United States that we can undertake a problem many times more difficult? Have we been so successful in the fair treatment and civilization of our own 300,000 Indians that we wish to be responsible for 14,000,000 more? Is the government of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia so firmly established on principles of truth and righteousness that we can now transfer our energies to the uplift of Tampico and Mazatlan and the City of Mexico?

Von Moltke used to say that he had worked out three different detailed plans for the invasion of England by a German army, but he never could contrive a plan for getting the army back again. A stroke of the pen can send an army into Mexico. How many strokes of the sword will be needed to keep it there?

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10138) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of such soldiers and sailors, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. BRYAN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. SHIVELY, Mr. BRYAN, and Mr. MCCUMBER conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 13044, an act to pension widows and minor and helpless children of officers and enlisted men who served during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection, or in China, between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

DISPOSAL OF COAL LANDS.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask leave to introduce a bill for reference to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (S. 5167) to regulate the quantity of coal lands which may be entered or controlled by associations or corporations was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is a short bill, and I should like to have it published in the RECORD. I ask that it be read.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let it be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It can be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any association composed of persons now qualified by law to enter coal lands, or any corporation, incorporated under and by virtue of the laws of any State, shall upon application to the register of the proper land office, have the right to enter by legal subdivisions any quantity of vacant coal lands of the United States not otherwise appropriated or reserved by competent authority, not exceeding 2,560 acres, upon payment to the receiver of not less than $10 per acre for such lands where the same shall be situate more than 15 miles from any completed railroad and not less than $20 per acre for such lands as shall be within 15 miles of such railroad, but at a price equal to their fair value to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior.

No such association or corporation shall own coal lands entered after the passage of this act in excess of said area, at any one time, nor be interested, directly or indirectly, in any other coal lands or coal taken therefrom, and no member of such association or corporation, or stockholder of such corporation, shall own any other coal lands or be interested, directly or indirectly, in any other coal lands, or coal taken therefrom, or in any other association or corporation owning or controlling any coal lands.

SEC. 2. Any association, corporation, member of such association or stockholder of such corporation, who violates any of the foregoing provisions shall, upon conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a felony and punished by a fine of not exceeding $10,000 or by imprisonment in the penitentiary for a period of not exceeding 10 years, or both.

SEC. 3. If any of such coal lands, entered after the passage of this act, shall be owned, leased, trusteed, possessed, or controlled by any device permanently, temporarily, directly, indirectly, tacitly, or in any manner whatsoever, so that they form part of or in any way effect any combination, or are in any wise controlled by any combination in the form of an unlawful trust, or the subject of any contract or conspiracy in restraint of trade in the mining or selling of coal, or of any holding of such lands by individuals, copartnership, association, corporation, mortgage, stock ownership, or control in excess of 2,560 acres, the title thereto shall be forfeited to the United States of America by proceedings instituted by the Attorney General in the courts for that purpose.

SEC. 4. That of the moneys received for the lands so entered all above the said minimum price shall be paid to the State in which such lands are situate.

THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, out of order I desire to have a short resolution printed and lie over until to-morrow. Let the Secretary read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 330), as follows:

Resolved, That the President is hereby requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to cause to be transmitted to the Senate all information, papers, correspondence, and records in the Department of State relative to the negotiation and ratification of the so-called Hay-Pauncefote treaty signed November 18, 1901.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over under the rule.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business, which was temporarily laid aside, is Senate resolution 156.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 1 hour and 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 7, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 6, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art from everlasting to everlasting, our God and our Father, our light, our strength, our refuge amid all the changing scenes of life, quicken our susceptibilities, strengthen our good resolutions, and guide us by Thy counsels that we may walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called to-day and all subsequent days. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, April 4, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 10138) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon and had appointed Mr. SHIVELY, Mr. BRYAN, and Mr. MCCUMBER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4968. An act for the relief of Hyacinthe Villeneuve.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

PATENTS TO PUBLIC LANDS IN CERTAIN CASES.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 1651) to authorize the issue of absolute and unqualified patents to public lands in certain cases.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I suppose the gentleman from Colorado does not desire to pass the House bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No. There is a Senate bill (S. 474) introduced by Senator GRONNA, which is a duplicate of the House bill. It is on the calendar and I would like to have that passed.

Mr. MANN. Let the gentleman ask unanimous consent.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill, the duplicate of the House bill, be considered in lieu of the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that a similar Senate bill be considered instead of the House bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Is there objection to the consideration of the Senate bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed in cases where patents for public lands have been issued to entrymen under the provisions of the acts of Congress approved March 3, 1909, and June 22, 1910, reserving to the United States all coal deposits therein, and lands so patented are subsequently classified as noncoal in character, to issue new or supplemental patents to such entrymen, conveying to them the absolute and unqualified title to the lands so previously entered, patented, and thereafter classified as noncoal.

The following committee amendment was read:

Strike out all of said bill after the word "patents," in line 10, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "without such reservation."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have some explanation of this amendment. I find nothing in the report of the committee on the House bill in reference to it.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Colorado yield to me?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. I called the attention of the committee after they reported the bill to the fact that the Government did not issue such a thing as an absolute and unqualified patent. All patents to land in the western country contain certain reservations, like the right to construct canals, the recognition of water rights. All that is desired here was to have a patent issued in the usual form without the coal reservation, and I suggested the amendment, which simply provides for the issuance of a patent in the usual form.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the committee as to the scope or limit of the patent that we issue where the Government reserves the coal deposit and the mineral deposit? I notice in the report that they have difficulty in transferring a limited title where they have merely a surface right granted.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman realizes the fact that landowners prefer to have a fee title; a limited title with a reservation of coal is, in a way, a cloud on the title, even though there is no coal there. In these cases where the Government has decided that there is no coal there would seem to be no reason why there should be a reservation of coal in the patent.

Mr. MANN. They get a fee title in these lands.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; with a reservation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it regarded as an incumbrance because others may have the right to go upon the land and prospect for mineral rights, and so forth?

Mr. MONDELL. That is one reason. As a matter of fact, it is not a surface right. The rights people receive are very excellent rights. They are, in fact, as the gentleman from Illinois just said, a fee with a reservation of the coal. They are very good titles, but they are not as satisfactory as they would be if there was not this reservation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the explanation is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wyoming or the gentleman from Colorado a question in reference to the amendment which the committee has reported—to strike out the language as to the absolute and unqualified title. I agree with the committee in being in favor of the amendment, but it looks to me as though it was a little reflection on the Department of the Interior, which on April 23, 1912, reported on the bill in favor of having an absolute and unqualified title to the lands. Is it true that the Land Office officials in the Department of the Interior have not discovered that the Government does not give absolute and unqualified titles to land?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I may say, as the gentleman will observe, I had a similar favorable report upon my bill from the last administration.

Mr. MANN. I am not speaking of administrations one way or the other. While these reports are signed by the Secretary or Assistant Secretary, they are made up by clerks, I suppose. Do not the clerks in the Interior Department know what kind of title the Government of the United States issues? Does it have to be left to the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming to inform the present Land Office how the Government issues a title and what kind of a title it issues?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I can not answer the gentleman positively. Possibly that may be true in this case. I was looking to see if the report on the Senate bill made any mention of it, but I do not observe that it does.

I feel that the amendment, however, is eminently proper, and it seems to me, whether it has been overlooked or not, that it ought to be adopted.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. What does the bill in its present form, the Senate bill with the amendments, really provide?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, a number of years ago the Interior Department withdrew very large tracts of land that was supposed to be coal land from all forms of entry for investigation and classification. In the State of Colorado they just made a blanket withdrawal of about 9,000,000 acres of land, and much of it was 20 to 50 miles from any coal land. Last year, after examination, they restored almost 2,000,000 acres of that land to entry as noncoal. There was no coal in the country, but in the meantime the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] with the assistance of some of us passed a bill allowing homesteaders and desert-land entrymen to take surface titles to these coal lands.

Mr. MURDOCK. With a reservation as regards the coal?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes. After the Government made the examination through the Geological Survey, and found there was no coal in the country at all, it left a lot of farmers with only what is called a surface title to their lands. It was really a title with a reservation of coal, but this reservation has been a great nuisance to the people, and they have to put the reservation in leases and deeds and mortgages, and they do not look upon it as a good title. The people in the United States are accustomed to wanting to own the land from the sky above to the center of the earth.

Mr. MURDOCK. But it is a perfectly good title, nevertheless?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It is not so considered. It is a cloud on the title, and depreciates the value of it, for this reason: There is always a reservation there, and the Government could at any time allow somebody to go and prospect for coal, when there is no coal within 50 miles of the land.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does this bill apply only to those 2,000,000 acres to which the gentleman has referred?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, no; it applies to other States.

Mr. MURDOCK. It only applies to those lands where withdrawal has been canceled?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; and afterwards classified as noncoal by the department. It simply directs the Secretary of the Interior Department to issue to these people a title as if the reservation had not been there at all. There will still be a reservation of a right of way for ditches, and so forth.

Mr. MURDOCK. If subsequently a man who has a title under this bill discovers coal on his land, the coal is his?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; but they are very careful about that. There is not any land that is restored that is anywhere near any coal. My report on this bill describes the objects and purposes of the measure, and I desire to call attention to it as follows:

This bill is identical in language with H. R. 23238, of the Sixty-second Congress, upon which the Public Lands Committee of the House made a unanimous and favorable report, No. 603, second session Sixty-second Congress. The bill is also identical in terms with Senate bill S. 6402 of the Sixty-second Congress, which passed the Senate on February 7, 1913. But neither the Senate bill nor House bill were reached upon the calendar of the House before the adjourning of the Sixty-second Congress on March 4, 1913.

This bill was again submitted to the Department of the Interior of the present administration for report, and the Secretary has reported thereon as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, August 26, 1913.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

SIR: In response to your request therefor I have the honor to report on H. R. 1651, as follows:

The bill proposes to authorize the issuance of new or supplemental patents conveying the absolute and unqualified title in cases where patents for public lands have been issued, under the provisions of the acts of March 3, 1909 (35 Stat., 844), and of June 22, 1910 (36 Stat., 583), reserving to the United States all coal deposits therein in instances where the lands so patented are subsequently classified as noncoal in character. This department knows of no reason why this bill should not be enacted.

A similar report was made April 27, 1912, on Senate bill 6402, Sixty-second Congress, identical in terms with this bill, and said bill was passed by the Senate February 7, 1913.

Senate bill 474, present session, identical in terms with this bill, is pending in the Senate, upon which favorable report has been made.

Respectfully,

A. A. JONES, Acting Secretary.

The report filed upon this bill in the Sixty-second Congress by the present author gives the reasons for the enactment of the law very clear and specific, as follows:

"Prior to and since the passage of the acts of Congress approved March 3, 1909, and June 22, 1910, large tracts of land throughout the Western States have been withdrawn from entry as coal land. The withdrawals were many of them made in rather a hasty manner and without any opportunity of investigating the character of a large portion of the land withdrawn, and necessarily a very large part of the land withdrawn as coal land was found afterwards, upon investigation, to contain no coal whatever. In many cases nearly whole counties were withdrawn, and afterwards upon investigation found to be noncoal land, and have been so classified. There are large tracts of land now withdrawn for examination for coal, and when they are examined will be found to contain no coal, and will be restored to entry under the public-land laws. But in the meantime, and while the land is withdrawn, and before it is classified as noncoal, the acts above referred to have been in operation, and thousands of homestead entries have been made of the surface right of the land, and surface patents have been issued to the entrymen, reserving to the Government the coal contained therein.

"Everyone recognizes that where there is no coal to reserve a restricted patent and the consequent conditional or limited title is wholly unnecessary and leads to possible violation of contracts, litigation, and uncertainty, and consequent hardships, expense, and losses. The people owning these limited titles are quite insistent upon there being some provision whereby the Government can grant them an unconditional and unqualified title. Reservations in a title are always ground for disputes and are not only a cloud upon the title, but very largely a perpetual nuisance to the owner. So wherever those conditions can be avoided it is deemed best to do so.

"In fact, many people do not feel that they have a good title where they can only obtain a quitclaim deed to the surface or where in every mortgage or lease or conveyance or other instrument affecting the property they must employ a skilled lawyer to put in the necessary reservations to preserve them from liability. It therefore depreciates the value of the property and promotes litigation and is invariably a cause of dissatisfaction. And while the homesteaders have been compelled to take limited surface titles to those lands that were at one time withdrawn as possible coal land, at the same time, where the lands have since been officially and carefully inspected and examined and learned to contain no coal whatever, it is believed that there is no good reason why the Government should not grant an absolute and unqualified title to the land.

"This bill has been prepared and introduced for that purpose. It has met with the hearty and unqualified approval of the Interior Department, as will be shown by their report given below, and your committee believes that the bill should be passed without amendment:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
"Washington, April 23, 1912.

"Hon. JOSEPH T. ROBINSON,
"Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
"House of Representatives.

"SIR: I am in receipt of your request for a report on H. R. 23238, which proposes to authorize the issuance of patents conveying 'absolute and unqualified titles to lands' which have been classified as noncoal in character after the issuance of patents containing a reservation of the coal in the lands patented.

"In reply you are informed that this department knows of no reason why this bill should not be enacted.

"Very respectfully,

"SAMUEL ADAMS,
"First Assistant Secretary."

Since the preparation of that report the reasons for the enactment of this legislation have become much stronger and more apparent and conclusive. There are a very large number of entrymen upon the public domain of the West who settled upon withdrawn coal lands, and almost every month large portions of those withdrawn lands are declared to be noncoal in character and thrown open to unconditional agricultural entry under the public-land laws. In the State of Colorado alone recently 2,000,000 acres of the 9,000,000 that had been withdrawn for more than six or eight years was, after exhaustive examination by the Geological Survey, declared by the Secretary of the Interior to have no coal in it whatever, and was released from that withdrawal and thrown open to agricultural entry. In many cases there are adjoining farms where one man has an absolute and unconditional title from the Government, while his neighbor has only a surface right. This is an entirely unwarranted hardship and cloud upon the title of the surface entrymen. His land is not worth nearly as much, because he has at best only deficient and defective title. The Department of the Interior fully recognizes this injustice, and has always been favorable to the enactment of this relief measure. The homestead entrymen holding these limited surface titles are vitally interested in having this cloud removed, and are very naturally and justly exceedingly anxious to have this bill passed.

Your committee believes that the bill should expeditiously pass without further amendments.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Colorado will yield, I would like to make a statement for the benefit of the gentleman from Kansas. In the Lemmon land district, in South Dakota, a few years ago the department withdrew practically all of the land in the district on the supposition that there was coal underneath the surface. It practically paralyzed that section of our State, and those who had homestead entries were unable to make final proof; and the gentleman, coming from a Western State, knows what the effect is on a community where that condition obtains. Congress, in order to relieve the situation, passed a law providing that they might make proof and acquire title to the surface.

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. In this section of South Dakota to which I refer an examination was made by the Geological Survey later, and out of a million or more acres of land they found about one section, or at most a part of one township, that did have some lignite coal underneath the surface. That was classified as coal land and the balance of the tract was classified as nonmineral in character. In the meantime many patents had issued for the surface to entrymen, and they desire, in view of the fact that their land is the same as other nonmineral land, the same kind of a patent.

Mr. MURDOCK. What is the practical difficulty in transferring land with this reservation in the title?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It is the same as any qualification in a title, and affects to some extent its marketability. There are those who decline or rather object to taking titles with any reservation such as this in the title.

Mr. MURDOCK. If there is no coal there, the matter of coal can not enter into the embarrassment—that is, its presence or nonpresence.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It presumes that possibly there may be, and that somebody is going to trespass on the land for the purpose of prospecting.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then the whole matter does hinge on the embarrassment that would come from trespassing?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is all there is to it?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That, I think, is sufficient in itself to justify the passage of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the title by striking out the words "absolute and."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended to accord with the text.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MINE RESCUE STATION AT M'ALESTER, OKLA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 3988) for the purchase of a building and lot as a mine rescue station at McAlester, Okla.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Florida rose.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I see the gentleman from Florida, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, is on his feet. Does the bill come from his committee?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It does; yes.

Mr. MANN. I see the reference was changed. How many of these bills have been reported for mine rescue stations?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I think only two. I think one at Pittsburgh and this one are the only ones I can remember just now.

Mr. MANN. How many are pending before the committee?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do not recall another one. There may be, and it seems to me there was one in Tennessee and one in West Virginia, but I do not think they are pending before the committee just now.

Mr. MANN. I have the impression—I may be wrong——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I think those two were reported in the last general omnibus bill.

Mr. MANN (continuing). That quite a number of these bills have been introduced for mine rescue stations all over the United States; maybe some in Canada.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. They have not been considered by the committee at all.

Mr. MANN. Well, does the gentleman think we ought to pass bills of this character by unanimous consent without having defined what the policy of the Government is in reference to this matter?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I think we ought to pass this particular bill, because if the gentleman will read the report——

Mr. MANN. I have done the committee the honor to read the report and the report gives no information whatever—only one page long and two-thirds of it is quotations with not much information.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. There is not much about it. The only information offered our committee is this: That some mine workers and operators out in Oklahoma bought this property and constructed this building, or they bought the building, rather, and they failed to pay for it, and there is about $5,500 left unpaid. Dr. Holmes, who was before the committee, said the property is admirably suited for this purpose, and the property is undoubtedly worth $10,000, and these mine workers and operators now propose to turn the property over to the Government if the Government will pay the residue of $5,500. That is all there is to it. Dr. Holmes, in whom the committee has great confidence, states that this rescue station is needed. There was an opportunity for the Government to make at least $4,500 by the transaction and get the property, which he says is admirably suited to the purpose in view. Believing that, and that the property would probably be lost to the Government unless steps are taken now to secure it, the committee saw fit to report it. Of course, if the gentleman wants to object, it is entirely within his right to do so.

Mr. MANN. Well, here is a case where certain gentlemen concluded they wanted a mine rescue station and they would superintend it. They were going to pay the money; it was for their benefit. Finally they got started on the enterprise and they flunked on it, and now they are proposing that we ought to pay for this. They selected the place, they started the project, and now they say to the Government, You pay for it or it will be lost. I do not put such a great deal of confidence in such a proposition.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The situation in Oklahoma in the mining country is very much like the situation in the mining country in my district. We have a mine-rescue car that is stationed in that section of the country, and it is necessary to have these rescue stations in order to carry out the work that is laid out by the department in case of mine accidents; and it is necessary that there shall be Federal control of that rescue station because the work of the station is by the Federal Government. The rescue station is part of the policy we adopted here some five years ago, and this is simply to carry out the work that was authorized and directed to be done——

Mr. MANN. Authorized and directed by whom?

Mr. CAMPBELL. By the Government of the United States.

Mr. MANN. About this station?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, this station, as I say, is an incident to the work that was directed to be done by the Federal Government in connection with accidents in mines.

Mr. MANN. Dr. Holmes does a great work; I have no doubt about that. He is the most enterprising and pushing man connected with any government in the world in the way of extending the jurisdiction of his own bureau. No one else can hold a candle to him for one moment in pushing. He is doing good work; but I doubt very much the desirability of letting him, without asking Congress anything about it, where mine-rescue stations are located through private arrangement, say to Congress, "Here, you pay the bill." I think we are fully able to determine those matters for ourselves.

Mr. CAMPBELL. In this case the mine-rescue station will be located at the place designated by Dr. Holmes if we have been contemplating such a site for such a station.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; if the gentleman will permit me, we are paying $480 a year rent for this particular place now. We are paying $40 a month, or $480 a year.

Mr. MANN. We are paying rent for a great many buildings in Washington and elsewhere, I will say to the gentleman; on a great many buildings——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; we are.

Mr. MANN (continuing). Throughout the country, but I have not yet discovered the fact we pay rent is a conclusive argument in favor of building the building.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Not at all. The gentleman admits that this a good work. Here is a mine rescue station which has been established with the consent of the persons charged with that duty, and the Government is paying $40 a month, or $480 a year, rent, and for $5,500 we can get a property worth $10,000 and save the payment of that rent. We have either got to do that or we will construct a building at that same place at a much greater expense.

Mr. MANN. I have discovered this: That when Dr. Holmes is driving the team every Member of Congress can put on the brakes and then it will go ahead faster than any other team in the Government service.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, if my friend wants to take the responsibility of objecting to his kind of work——

Mr. MANN. That does not bother me at all. I object. That brings it to a head.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

TERMS OF COURT AT STEUBENVILLE, OHIO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent is the bill (H. R. 5849) to amend section 100 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have the bill read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 100 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 100. The State of Ohio is divided into two judicial districts, to be known as the northern and southern districts of Ohio. The northern district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Ashland, Ashtabula, Cuyahoga, Carroll, Columbiana, Crawford, Geauga, Holmes, Lake, Lorain, Medina, Mahoning, Portage, Richland, Summit, Stark, Tuscarawas, Trumbull, and Wayne, which shall constitute the eastern division; also the territory embraced on the date last mentioned in the counties of Auglaize, Allen, Defiance, Erie, Fulton, Henry, Hancock, Hardin, Huron, Lucas, Mercer, Marion, Ottawa, Paulding, Putnam, Seneca, Sandusky, Van Wert, Williams, Wood, and Wyandot, which shall constitute the western division of said district. Terms of the district court for the eastern division shall be held at Cleveland on the first Tuesdays in February, April, and October, and at Youngstown on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in March; and for the western division, at Toledo on the last Tuesdays in April and October. Grand and petit jurors summoned for service at a term of court to be held at Cleveland may, if in the opinion of the court the public convenience so requires, be directed to serve also at the term then being held or authorized to be held at Youngstown. Crimes and offenses committed in the eastern division shall be cognizable at the terms held at Cleveland or at Youngstown, as the court may direct. Any suit brought in the eastern division may, in the discretion of the court, be tried at the term held at Youngstown. The southern district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Adams, Brown, Butler, Champaign, Clark, Clermont, Clinton, Darke, Greene, Hamilton, Highland, Lawrence, Miami, Montgomery, Preble, Scioto, Shelby, and Warren, which shall constitute the western division; also the territory embraced on the date last mentioned in the counties of Athens, Belmont, Coshocton, Delaware, Fairfield, Fayette, Franklin, Gallia, Guernsey, Harrison, Hocking, Jackson, Jefferson, Knox, Licking, Logan, Madison, Meigs, Monroe, Morgan, Morrow, Muskingum, Noble, Perry, Pickaway, Pike, Ross, Union, Vinton, and Washington, which shall constitute the eastern division of said district. Terms of the district court for the western division shall be held at Cincinnati on the first Tuesdays in February, April, and October; and for the eastern division at Columbus on the first Tuesdays in June and December, and at Steubenville on the first Tuesdays of March and October: Provided, That suitable rooms and accommodations for holding court at Steubenville shall be furnished free of expense to the Government until the completion of the Federal building: And provided further, That terms of the district court for the southern district shall be held at Dayton on the first Mondays in May and November. Prosecutions for crimes and offenses committed in any part of said district shall also be cognizable at the terms held at Dayton. All suits which may be brought within the southern district, or either division thereof, may be instituted, tried, and determined at the terms held at Dayton."

Also the following committee amendment was read:

On page 3, line 15, strike out the colon after the word "October" and insert in lieu thereof a period and the following:

"Grand and petit jurors summoned for service at a term of court being held at Columbus may, if in the opinion of the court the public convenience so requires, be directed to serve also at the term being held or authorized to be held at Steubenville. Crimes and offenses committed in the eastern division shall be cognizable at the terms held at Columbus or at Steubenville, as the court may direct. Any suit brought in the eastern division may, in the discretion of the court, be tried at the term held at Steubenville."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FRANCIS] is not present, and if this matter is to be gone into I desire to have read a letter written by Federal Judge John F. Sater in reply to a letter from Mr. FRANCIS relative to this matter.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman that he have the letter read, and then, in the absence of his colleague, ask to have the bill passed over.

Mr. MURDOCK. Why would it not be a good plan to have the letter read at the time of the consideration of the measure?

Mr. MANN. We can have it read for information.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] suggests that the letter be read.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this letter, which is written in reply to an inquiry made of the judge by Representative FRANCIS, be read.

The SPEAKER. From whom does the letter come?

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. The Federal judge, Mr. Sater.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read the letter.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Are you to take this bill up now or pass it over?

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. If it is to be taken up now, I want the letter read. If it is to be passed over, I do not want it read.

The SPEAKER. It is up now, and there is nobody asking to have it passed over.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. I object, Mr. Speaker, and will withdraw the letter until the matter is taken up. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice. I want to be fair to Mr. FRANCIS.

Mr. MANN. I want to hear the letter.

Mr. MURDOCK. I can not see any point in reading the letter now when the matter is not to be taken up for consideration.

Mr. MANN. Does not my friend from Kansas think he can remember for two weeks?

Mr. MURDOCK. Not a letter.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the letter. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BRUMBAUGH] asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice.

Mr. MANN. Now, I ask to have the letter read, while reserving the right to object; that is, if it is not a long letter. I do not want to detain the House.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the letter will be read. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF OHIO,
JUDGE'S CHAMBERS,
Columbus, March 9, 1914.

Hon. W. B. FRANCIS, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter of March 3 was on my desk on my return from Cincinnati, where I have been holding court. The clerk also handed me your letter to him in reference to the bill now pending in Congress entitled H. R. 5849, relative to the establishment of a Federal court at Steubenville, Ohio.

It is a judge's duty to perform his allotted task and if additional court centers are created I shall endeavor to meet requirements imposed. Your letters call for an expression of my views and I shall therefore give them after having, with the aid of the clerk, gathered the information sought by you.

I am just about to close 7 years of service on the bench, in which 14 terms of court have been held at Columbus. In those 14 terms there have appeared on the civil trial dockets as originating in Jefferson, Belmont, Monroe, and Harrison Counties but 35 cases. Of that number 27 were settled without a trial. Only 8 were tried. This gives an average of 2¼ a term; the number actually tried is slightly over 1 a year. In addition to those which were formally placed upon the trial docket there were 3 injunction cases that were tried and disposed of soon after the filing of the bills. Two of these were strike cases and one involved an oil lease. This brings the total number of cases actually tried in 7 years up to 11. In the same 7 years 26 indictments have appeared on the criminal docket. Of this number only 6 cases went to trial. In all of the others there was either a plea of guilty or for some other reason the cases fell by the wayside without coming to trial. The net result of trials, therefore, in 7 years from the above-named counties is 17. There have been a few cases brought—usually personal-injury cases—which have been settled before they were placed upon the trial docket.

The above indicates the small amount of business coming to the Federal court from the four mentioned counties, and that if a court were established at Steubenville it would involve great expense to the Government and little benefit to litigants or others concerned.

I appreciate that the distance from Steubenville to Columbus is considerable, and that at times it involves some hardship to the parties, their counsel, and witnesses to try a case in the Federal court at Columbus. On the other hand, to construct a court room with other suitable conveniences necessary to the operation of a court—such as offices for the clerk, marshal, and district attorney; chambers for the judge, grand and petit jury rooms and witness rooms—means a large expenditure for the Government. The mere opening of a term of court also involves quite an expenditure. Almost all of those connected with the court are allowed, and properly so, their traveling expenses and some of them a per diem for living expenses. Their compensation is such that they could not be induced to accept a position which requires much traveling about if they were to pay out of their own funds on the several trips their railroad fare and living expenses. Jurors are allowed a mileage and $3 per day. To say nothing of the interest on the investment for proper quarters for the conduct of the business of a court, the operating expense is great.

The question therefore is: Shall the United States bear the burden incident to the cost of such quarters and to the maintenance of a court which, if history repeats itself, will have so little to do? If it be conceded that there will be come increase in business resulting from the establishment of a court, I dare say it will not be seriously contended that it will come from either Monroe or Harrison County, for the reason that the employment of the people of such counties is not of the character which brings litigation to any appreciable extent into the Federal courts.

The history of the effort to maintain a court at Dayton ought to be helpful. That is a much larger city than Steubenville and, reckoning such city and the country tributary, the population is much greater from which business may be drawn than that of the four counties named in your letter. Personally I have endeavored to satisfy those who do or would do business in the Federal court at Dayton. It is fair to them to say that some of the cases originating in Dayton or adjoining territory have been tried at Cincinnati, but they have been pressed by counsel for trial at that place instead of Dayton. This in itself is a significant fact. The largest number of cases ever tried at Dayton at one term was three. There were but four cases on the docket at that term. There have been terms at which there were none for trial. On one occasion I did all the business that was offered or could be done within 20 minutes, adjourned the term of court, and took the next train home. As a jury had been brought in and was entitled to its mileage and per diem, the court officers to their costs, and the Government employees to their mileage and maintenance, those 20 minutes were quite expensive. I finally last fall declined to allow a jury to be called when there was but one case on the docket for trial. This was on account of the abnormal expense which would be incurred in the trial of that one case. It was subsequently placed on the Cincinnati February docket for trial and soon after the opening of the term was settled. In the course of time, on account of the importance and continued growth of Dayton, Springfield, Xenia, and minor towns in the vicinity of Dayton, with their large manufacturing interests, there will be an increased business, but it will be a long time, in my judgment, before it will assume importance.

I am of the opinion that the business in the four counties named in your letter, to wit, Jefferson, Belmont, Monroe, and Harrison, is insufficient to warrant the establishment of a court at Steubenville, and that the locating of a court there will be a costly and disappointing experiment.

If a court should be established there, there should be no October term. There are now seven terms of court to be met by the judges in this district, and frequently both of them are working at the same time on the docket. There are terms in February, April, May, June, October, November, and December. The February term usually laps well into March. Last month my juries were working just about 20 full days, and we got rid, in one way or another, of 29 cases. There is practically a full month's work yet on that Cincinnati term, but I was compelled to suspend temporarily on account of work here and in the circuit court of appeals, while Judge Hollister is going on with equity work. He will take the April term at Cincinnati, which usually runs until about the 1st of July, while I take the May term at Dayton, which this year will have a few cases, and the June term here, the jury work of which has sometimes run quite well into July, but is usually finished late in June. The equity work is ordinarily cleared up in the summer months. The October term at Cincinnati is the big term of the year. Usually one judge works the law side and the other the equity side. The November term at Dayton has sometimes fallen down entirely, but more frequently has had one or two, but never more than three cases for trial. The December term here more frequently runs into January than otherwise. The business in this eastern division has grown in volume and importance greatly since the location of a judge at this point most of the year. If there is to be a court at Steubenville, the terms should be in March and September, and even then there is danger of a conflict as regards the March term and the February term at Cincinnati.

I can not quite understand why you should want in your bill the last two sentences. I can not believe that you appreciate their significance. They were embodied verbatim or in substance in the original bill establishing a court at Dayton, and it was the subject of careful consideration by my late associate, Judge Thompson, and myself. Under those clauses, your clients in Steubenville, Bridgeport, Bellaire, or elsewhere along the Ohio River, if the act is to be literally construed, can be dragged all the way to Dayton to try their cases—can be forced to pass through Columbus, where a court is in session the greater part of the year, and be forced into trials at the still more remote point of Dayton. Citizens of Ironton, Portsmouth, Lancaster, Newark, and Cincinnati may be compelled to go to Dayton to have their cases tried, even though in so doing they are compelled to pass through other points in the district which are much nearer and at which courts are sitting almost continuously. Your clients thus called upon to try cases at Dayton have no protection except such as a trial judge may in the exercise of a possible discretion afford. Instead of giving the litigants the opportunity of trying their cases at the nearest point to their homes, they may be taken in many instances the greatest distance possible within the district. Instead of perpetuating such an anomalous situation, would it not be well entirely to eliminate it from the law?

In the foregoing I have made no mention of bankruptcy matters, for the reason that it is only occasionally a contest arises in a bankruptcy proceeding which calls for a hearing before a district judge. The referee in bankruptcy works out successfully almost all cases.

Yours, very truly,

——— ———.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BRUMBAUGH] asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ANNUITIES TO MEDAWAKANTON AND WAHPAKOOTA SIOUX INDIANS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11246) for the restoration of annuities to the Medawakanton and the Wahpakoota (Santee) Sioux Indians, declared forfeited by the act of February 16, 1863.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will report the next bill.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER AT BATON ROUGE, LA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13985) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Baton Rouge, La.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has satisfied himself in regard to this bill, which was passed over at his suggestion two weeks ago?

Mr. MANN. I believe I have.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, is this merely an extension of the time for the construction of this bridge?

Mr. ADAMSON. That is, generally, the effect of it; but the bill was rewritten in order to eliminate one provision of the old bill.

Mr. MANN. They desire to disagree to the committee amendment, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. ADAMSON. We want to pass the bill as originally introduced.

Mr. MOORE. The amendment is disposed of?

Mr. ADAMSON. I want to take the amendment out.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Georgia a question?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. BRYAN. The purpose of the arrangement is, as I understand, to establish a toll system. It is to make possible the charging of tolls?

Mr. ADAMSON. It is a proposition for a bridge and terminal company—a proposition, I believe, to accommodate several railroads.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that practically under the existing law tolls are a matter for settlement by the Secretary of War. The provision of the law is that the tolls shall be reasonable and just, and the Secretary of War determines them. This bill, as they desire to pass it, provides that reasonable tolls may be charged and received. That would be allowed under the general law; and then they go on and provide that "no rate for passage of a single passenger on a railroad train shall exceed 25 cents." Of course, the Secretary of War could not allow a higher rate of toll than 25 cents. He could make a lower rate of toll than 25 cents, I think, under the existing law, regardless of the passage of this bill.

Mr. BRYAN. Will it be provided that there shall be no free tolls to the railroad itself that builds the bridge, as in the case of the Panama Canal? [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not care to take the time to grow facetious on this matter. If the gentleman desires, I will send him an almanac that will answer his question. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I believe that under the general bridge law it is provided that all railroads shall be treated on equal terms. The question as to whether or not the railroad that built the bridge will have to pay tolls itself has not been discussed, but will be determined by the Secretary of War.

Mr. BRYAN. Has the gentleman obtained that information out of an almanac? [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think that grade of humor will be found in any almanac.

The SPEAKER. Does anybody want to explain this bill?

Mr. ADAMSON. I think it is fully explained, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. Let us have the bill read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13985) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Baton Rouge, La.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Baton Rouge Bridge and Terminal Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Louisiana, its successors and assigns, be, and are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Baton Rouge, La., at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906: Provided, however, That reasonable rates of toll may be charged and received and no rate for passage of a single passenger on a railroad train shall exceed 25 cents.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia if he can tell how long this bridge is to be? What is to be its total length?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not know that I can give it to you exactly.

Mr. MOORE. It is something over 100 miles from New Orleans, north, and it is upon that point on the Mississippi River where there must be a very heavy flow of water, particularly in flood times. I want to ascertain about how long the bridge would be and what the span would be through which navigation is to pass.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is to be built under the terms of the general bridge act. We leave that to the War Department, you know.

Mr. MOORE. Yes; the gentleman always falls back—and properly, I presume, on the general bridge act.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is not a matter of "falling back." The general bridge law is for a general purpose, so that we would not have to make provision for each case in a special act. We put it in the discretion of the War Department, so that the War Department, which has charge of the improvement of rivers, would see to it that the construction of the bridge would not interfere with the work on the river.

Mr. MOORE. It appears that there is 100 miles or more of navigable water below this bridge to New Orleans, and thence over a hundred miles to the Gulf. One of the great troubles with the Mississippi River arises from floods, and those floods would probably make a tremendous impact against this bridge, so near the mouth of the river. Therefore the question of the width of the span becomes one of very great importance, because in the recent floods in the Ohio River the bridges were swept away, perhaps on account of faulty construction, or perhaps due to the lack of engineering foresight when they were constructed. If the gentleman from Georgia is satisfied that under the general bridge act all these precautions will be taken in a matter of this consequence, I suppose that is sufficient.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, there is much wisdom in the observations of the gentleman from Philadelphia, as usual, and the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers have been imbued with a great deal of the same wisdom. We have delegated to them the administration of the general bridge act, and I think they are keenly alive to the very ideas that the gentleman so aptly expresses.

Mr. MOORE. I thank the gentleman for thus introducing the cooperation of the engineers into this subject.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is their job. They are there to do that work.

Mr. MOORE. I would like to ask the gentleman if actual construction has commenced upon this bridge?

Mr. ADAMSON. It has not.

Mr. MOORE. Then the right of this company to build this bridge is to be extended, because it has not commenced operations at all at this point?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will say to the gentleman that the bridge company was unable to finance the scheme, particularly under the old bridge proposition, where the community had insisted on making it also a public highway bridge; but the community afterwards withdrew that insistence and now consents to making it a railroad bridge.

Mr. MOORE. When we are considering a proposition extending the time for the building of a bridge, the question again arises whether it is expedient to build a bridge of this magnitude. The Baton Rouge Bridge & Terminal Co. want more time. They want from one to three years more time in order to construct a bridge. They had time under the original bill granting them the right to construct the bridge. The gentleman from Georgia says they are not prepared to finance it. Will they be equipped eventually to begin the construction, or is the privilege being granted to them to keep somebody else from building a bridge at that point? What are the facts?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, they have no privilege. They have never had any. We granted the consent of Congress in order that they could exercise whatever franchise they had under the local law, provided it was done under the guidance and approval of the Chief of Engineers of the United States, charged with the duty of preserving navigation. I have not stated that they are unable to finance this bridge. They failed under the old one, but they can now finance this bridge, and the proposition is to grant consent to build this bridge under the approval and guidance of the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman is satisfied with that arrangement, and satisfied that this company is as well qualified as any other to build this bridge?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will say to the gentleman that if this one fails and another applies I would favor considering it. I do not want to obstruct navigation with too many bridges.

Mr. MOORE. If the gentleman from Georgia is satisfied, I am.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman and I entirely agree at heart. The gentleman expresses it better than I can; that is all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended.

Mr. ADAMSON. It does not need any amendment. We voted down the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Very well.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PUBLIC BUILDING, MEMPHIS, TENN.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11747) to increase the limit of cost for the purchase of a site and the construction of a public building in Memphis, Tenn.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the public building act approved March 4, 1913, authorizing the acquisition of a site of a new subpost-office building in Memphis, State of Tennessee, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to change the limit of cost heretofore fixed for said object from an aggregate of $40,000 to a limit of cost of $100,000 for said site; that any unexpended balance of the appropriation heretofore or herein made for said site and building are hereby made available for both land and building; and that the sum of $60,000 is hereby appropriated, under said new limit, to be immediately available, said sum, or as much of said sum as may be necessary, to be used for the enlargement of the present site.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I want to offer——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] reserves the right to object.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the very brief report that accompanies this bill shows that of the six offers of sites only one of them was beyond the $100,000 limit, namely, one for $181,000; that the respective offers were as follows:

No. 1, $56,000; No. 2, $73,000; No. 3, $181,000; No. 4, $70,000; No. 5, $70,000; No. 6, $90,000.

The sum of $40,000 is at present available, but the committee recommends an additional appropriation of $60,000.

It has been my experience, limited as it may be, that when we increase appropriations for sites the landowners generally accommodate the Government by raising their prices to the maximum amount allowed. Here we have four available sites under $73,000, and yet the committee recommends an appropriation of $100,000. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee the justification for increasing the limit away beyond that which would be necessary to acquire one of these four sites.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman will observe that the bill provides that any balance left over is to be used toward the construction of the building to be provided for hereafter. The gentleman will see that one site runs up to $181,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; and I assume that that site is beyond contemplation.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; undoubtedly; but the best information the committee could get was that a suitable site could be purchased for something around $100,000. These bids are already in. These people, of course, can not charge any more for these particular sites.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is customary, when the appropriation is not adequate, as the gentleman knows, to reject the bids and then readvertise for new proposals.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Certainly. That will be done, and there will be no difficulty in getting a site for around $100,000—for about that much.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume that the committee and the department considered that these four or five sites offered at less than $73,000 were suitable sites.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; I think not. I do not think they considered that all of them were suitable sites at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will call the attention of the gentleman to the opinion of the department on that.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Does it say that they are all suitable sites?

Mr. STAFFORD. It says:

Proposals have been received for 24 sites, and the prices asked for the 6 which have been recommended as desirable range from $56,000 to $181,000.

So these four sites, offered for less than $73,000, are considered by the department as desirable sites. Why should we increase the appropriation beyond that amount which is needed for a desirable site?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Does the gentleman believe that the department is going to pay any more than it thinks is absolutely necessary?

Mr. STAFFORD. As I said in my preliminary statement, I have known cases where an inadequate amount was recommended in one public-building appropriation bill, and a higher amount was subsequently recommended two or four years afterwards and the property owners raised the price to the amount of the increased appropriation.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I wish to say this to the gentleman——

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not wish to do anything to prevent the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] from obtaining adequate money to go ahead with his building proposition, but I think we should be on guard, and should not give any bonus to these property owners.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to say to the gentleman that this committee has done the very best it could in all these matters. In the matter of the gentleman himself the committee did the best it could.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not question that at all.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. And the committee were largely guided in their action by the statement of the gentleman himself as to conditions in his own community.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. And the committee in acting upon this bill acted largely upon what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] said about conditions in his own community. We have investigated the whole matter. We are not to have any omnibus bill, and we are only presenting to this House those matters which appear to us to be urgent and in the nature of emergencies. Now, if the gentleman thinks he knows more about it than the committee which has thoroughly investigated it, and the department which has reported upon it, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] who comes from that community, and if the gentleman from Wisconsin desires to object to these bills upon that ground, all right.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, well, as to that, permit me to say that I have no apologies to make to this House for having pressed upon the attention of the Public Building Committee a bill that had the recommendation of two Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury. The limited amount carried in that bill was the amount recommended by those Secretaries. The chairman of the committee and the members of the comittee treated me very considerately in that matter——

Mr. MANN. And therefore you have no right to have an opinion on anything else.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman certainly has a right to an opinion on something else.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here we have no report except a brief excerpt from the statement of the Treasury Department. In the report accompanying the bill which I favored there were two reports of the Secretary of the Treasury. I am perfectly within my rights in calling the attention of the House to this condition and in asking for information. I do not think the chairman of the committee is called upon to intimate that I was particularly captious or inconsistent in making these queries, which are entirely within my rights. Now, I am still seeking information.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Just one moment. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that a committee of this House ought to rely considerably upon the statement of the Member of Congress coming from the community, acting upon his oath as a Member before the committee, as to conditions existing in his community?

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no question about what the gentleman says.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. We acted here upon what the gentleman from Tennessee said.

Mr. STAFFORD. In reply to the gentleman, I should like to say that there is nothing in the report of the committee to show that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] came before the committee and made a statement as to the conditions there.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Here are the hearings.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is nothing in the brief report that will justify any semblance of that statement. Now I am inquiring for information that not only the House but the country ought to have.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The hearings were had and printed, and the gentleman could get them, if he desired.

Mr. MANN. May I humbly ask my friend from Florida a question, at some risk to myself? [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Not the slightest risk to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has been taking heads off so fast that I did not know whether he would allow anyone to question an act of the committee or not. He says that the committee acted on a report from the department and the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. The report on the bill fails to include any statement whatever concerning the report from the department or the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee. Does not the gentleman from Florida think that in making a report to the House the House is entitled to some of the information that comes before the committee?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Absolutely.

Mr. MANN. Why do we not get it?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Does the gentleman think that in reporting on a bill of this kind, in addition to having the hearings printed at great expense——

Mr. MANN. They are not printed at great expense and they are not accessible to Members of the House.

Mr. CLARK of Florida (continuing). That we ought to include in that report the information we get from the department in full——

Mr. MANN. I think so absolutely.

Mr. CLARK of Florida (continuing). And reprint the hearings?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that I do not ask that.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The printed hearings are there, and if any gentleman on the floor desired to get a copy of those hearings he could get it. I do not understand it to be the business of the chairman of the committee to furnish all the Members of the House with copies of the printed hearings.

Mr. MANN. No; but I do understand it to be the duty of the committee, in reporting a bill, to give some information in the report upon which the committee acts and not come into the House and say, "We have had hearings and you can send and get the hearings." The report is made for the purpose of furnishing information to the House. Members of the House are not required or supposed to hunt the committee rooms asking for hearings; it is the duty of the committee to furnish information to the House. The gentleman from Florida takes exception to some one questioning a bill reported from the committee and says it had a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, which is not in the report, and says it had a statement of the gentleman from Tennessee, which is not in the report of the committee. We are entitled to information and there is none in this report. I have noticed that most of the reports from this committee do not contain information of any value; then when we ask a question on the floor of the House we are told that it is none of our business; that the committee has passed on this matter and we can obtain the hearings.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I am the Member from Tennessee referred to, and I will take the greatest pleasure in explaining the entire bill to the House. The Congress at the last session provided $40,000 for the purchase of a substation post-office site near the Union Depot in Memphis. The crowded condition of the main post office at Memphis made it absolutely necessary, in the opinion of the department, which is set out in full in the hearings, that some such step should be taken. It is pointed out in the hearings that it will be an immense saving, fully $6,000 a year to the Post Office Department, if such an arrangement can be made. The committee of the House, and the House afterwards, took that view of it, and they did appropriate $40,000, which was supposed to be enough to buy the site.

When the Treasury Department advertised for sites a number of bids were handed in, but none of them were within the $40,000 limit. The lowest was $56,000, and I think one of $70,000, one of $73,000, and one of probably $90,000, and one more than $100,000. Now, under that situation the Treasury Department reported that there was not sufficient money to buy the site that ought to be bought. A bill was introduced to appropriate $60,000 additional for a site.

Answering the very proper question of my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], I say that the reason $100,000 was fixed was because the limit of $40,000 before fixed was too small, and if we appropriated enough to make exactly $73,000, the department might conclude that they wanted an $80,000 or a $90,000 site instead of the $56,000 site; they might conclude to take the $73,000 site, so it was deemed best by the committee to fix the limit at $100,000, so that they could get the site that they wanted. If they wanted the $56,000, the extra money could be used in constructing the building. By the way, they recommended a much larger site, indeed, about four times as many square feet as at first was deemed necessary. If there is any surplus that surplus is to be added to the building fund. Eighty thousand dollars has been appropriated for the building, and this surplus would simply be added to the $80,000.

It is something that is very much needed down in Memphis, and if there are any other questions about the proposition I will gladly answer them to the best of my ability.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the House whether he has any personal acquaintance with the respective sites where the offers were under $73,000?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not a personal acquaintance so as to fix a particular lot. I am familiar with the whole situation around the station. There are a number of lots, I think the one at $56,000 is not in front of or between the stations. I am not certain about this. We have two brand-new Union Stations. One half of the railroads joined together and built one station and the other half of the railroads built another Union Station about a block and a half away. There are about 16 railroads, I believe, centering in Memphis. The department considers the best site for a post-office building one of those mentioned in their report and near the two stations. My recollection is that the $56,000 site is a little distance away, and therefore farther removed from the new station. The other three sites are more nearly in front of the two stations. The Government should have as wide a choice as possible.

Mr. STAFFORD. These sites are available and desirable, as the department suggests in a letter to you, which is not printed in full in the report. What is the need of appropriating $27,000 more than the highest price for which these lot owners offered to dispose of the property? Does not the gentleman believe if we should carry an additional appropriation of $35,000, making available $75,000, or even $40,000, making available $80,000, he would have sufficient money to obtain a desirable site?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is possible that it might be so, and if the House feels that that should be done, there can be no objection on my part. I have done the best I can. I believe that the other way is best. Unquestionably it will take more than $80,000 to build the building which is to be put on the site. The site is to be larger than first contemplated and desired by the department.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand that these sites are, in the opinion of the gentleman, desirable for the purposes which the department has in mind?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am inclined to think they are.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman knows nothing to the contrary?

Mr. McKELLAR. I could not say anything positively about any particular site. I do not know the exact location of any particular site mentioned in the bids.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman did not state anything to the contrary in the hearings before the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I did not. I will say this: That in that condition of the building fund I would be very glad indeed to have the additional $20,000 or $10,000 or $25,000 added, if there should be such a surplus from the site fund, for the benefit of the building fund, and that is what will be the result of this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not wish to be captious about this——

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sure the gentleman is not.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection to increasing the allowance for the building, but I have had some little experience, limited, it is true, where landowners raised the price of their lands after having made one bid to meet the increased allowance made by a subsequent appropriation, and I am trying to guard against that. I do not want to deprive the gentleman in any way at all of the proper building site for his post office.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say this: That if that were done—that is, if the price were raised over a former bid—the department ought certainly to decline to accept any such bid.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, whether it ought to or not, we know that it is done on occasions.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should object to their accepting a bid which increased the price if it were called to my attention.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. MANN. As I understand it, there has been an appropriation for the site?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And another appropriation for the building?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; $40,000 appropriated for the site, and $80,000 for the building.

Mr. MANN. Of course we know these technical bills are often prepared by the department. Did the department prepare the original draft of this bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I did it myself, and I have got to offer an amendment to it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman having drafted the bill himself, I will ask him what is the meaning of the expression "aggregate of $40,000" in the following language:

So as to change the limit of cost heretofore fixed for said object from an aggregate of $40,000 to a limit of cost of $100,000 for said site.

Mr. McKELLAR. The words are unhappily chosen, and I think they should go out.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman if he is responsible for the grammar in the bill? Does the gentleman think it proper to say:

That any unexpended balance of the appropriation * * * are hereby made available.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; it is not. I want to say this, that I believe I am grammarian enough to write a sentence in a grammatical manner, and I think this must be a typographical error. I am obliged to the gentleman for his suggestion in respect to the aggregate of $40,000.

Mr. MANN. It should be $40,000?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And the word "balance" should be "balances"?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That should read:

That any unexpended balances of the appropriations heretofore made—

And so forth.

That really brings me to the question I was about to ask—$40,000 is available for the site and $80,000 for the building?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That makes $120,000, and there is $60,000 added here, which makes it $180,000?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is right.

Mr. MANN. And it is all made available for the purchase of a site?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then if it is I will say it ought to be changed so as to make only $100,000 available for the purchase of a site.

Mr. MANN. There are various bids. One is $56,000, and they run from that on up to $181,000. How does the gentleman know they will not take the $181,000 bid and spend that much money for a site, and then the gentleman will be put through another course here getting further appropriations for the building?

Mr. McKELLAR. Then he will change that right now to prevent that.

Mr. MANN. Here is an authorization to expend $180,000, under this bill, for a site.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is not the intention of the act, and if that construction can be placed on it we want to change it.

Mr. MANN. The bill reads:

That any unexpended balances of the appropriation heretofore or herein made for said site and building are hereby made available for both land and building.

That makes it all available for the building.

Mr. McKELLAR. The words "and building" should be stricken out.

Mr. MURDOCK. No; that would not fix it.

Mr. MANN. Then that would make it all available for the land. I do not see the purpose of putting in the expression—

That any unexpended balances of the appropriation heretofore or herein made for said site and building are hereby made available for both building and land.

The $40,000 which has been appropriated for the land is now available for the site; and, if you add $60,000 to that, that makes $100,000 for the site.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the gentleman is correct about that.

Mr. MANN. Of course, what the gentleman wants to do is to make any unexpended balance of the $100,000 for the site available for the building.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is precisely what I have in mind.

Mr. MANN. As I said before—and I am very fond of the gentleman from Tennessee—when it comes to drawing a technical bill like this, it is quite advisable sometimes to consult the technical department instead of sitting down and dictating it to a stenographer.

Mr. McKELLAR. That might be all right ordinarily, but when the gentleman from Illinois is here I am always delighted to have his assistance in arranging the matter. He is the best expert I know. The committee is not to blame at all for the verbal inaccuracies in this bill. The errors are all mine.

Mr. MANN. I would like to say that in calling attention to these defects in the bill I have no desire at all to take any chance of being jumped on by a committee which has unanimously reported this bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKELLAR. Are there any other questions?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman in regard to one further matter. I notice the last line of the bill says "to be used for the enlargement of the present site."

Mr. McKELLAR. That is to be stricken out. I already have an amendment for that purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the site already acquired?

Mr. McKELLAR. I say that is to be stricken out.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think this bill had better be passed over without prejudice for two weeks?

Mr. McKELLAR. I greatly prefer, if the gentleman will permit, to offer these amendments now and that the bill be passed to-day. There is no time like the present, when it is all fresh in our minds.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman be willing to accept an amendment making the limit of cost $75,000 instead of $100,000?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will be glad if the gentleman will make it larger than that, say, make it $90,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the report shows there are four sites under $73,000 already available.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is one at $90,000, and I suggest the gentleman allow the department that, at any rate. The chairman of the committee calls my attention to the fact that Mr. Newton, the Assistant Secretary, recommended an appropriation of $60,000, and I am inclined to think that the site can be bought, say, for $90,000. I think the department ought to be given that much latitude.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would that be entirely satisfactory to the gentleman, and would it conflict with any statement which he has made before the committee in pressing this bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think so——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I suggest the gentleman did state before the committee that the Assistant Secretary recommended $60,000 additional, and that was what was wanted, and that was required, and that is why we recommended it.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true, and that is the amount wanted, but rather than not pass the bill to-day I will accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I understand the gentleman from Tennessee strikes out "$100,000" and inserts "$90,000"?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not say that I am willing, but rather than have the matter go over I will do so. I would like to get the matter passed on now.

Mr. STAFFORD. I know the chairman has given careful consideration to the bill, and I would like——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I want to say one thing before we get too far in this matter. I want to state I have not said that no one had the right to criticize the committee or to criticize the chairman. I have not said anything of the sort or anything that tended in that direction. What I do say is that gentlemen contend that this committee ought to report the hearings. If we had reported the letter of the Secretary in full, then some gentlemen would have wanted to know why we did not report the statement in full. It is easy, you know, to pick out little things here and there in order to be contentious about these things; but I do not think—I stated it a while ago and I state it now—I do not think it is the duty of this committee, after having the hearings printed, so any Member could get them if he desired them, if they were interested enough to ask for them or call for them, that it is the duty of the committee to set out the hearings in full in the report. Now, we did not report this letter in full, but we did report the meat of the letter. We reported all there was in it that was worth anything to the House or anyone else in reaching a conclusion. Now, I want to say further that our committee rely very largely upon gentlemen in a little matter of this kind. We take it that they know what they are talking about when they go into the merits of a proposition in their own locality. The gentleman who introduced the bill stated this morning certain corrections had to be made in the bill. He has discovered it, and we were prepared to make those corrections in the bill, and these gentlemen have not discovered so many wonderful things as they imagine they have. I am not willing myself to reduce this amount. I think that the committee has acted with all the evidence before them, and I do not believe the Treasury Department is going to spend one cent more than necessary to buy this site. We took it that when sites range from $56,000 to $181,000 that $100,000 is a very fair compromise upon which to secure the site, and especially when it is provided that any balance left over is to go to the building. I can not see where the Government could lose anything and why the amount ought to be changed; but if the gentleman who introduced the bill is anxious to have it done, then the committee will make no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, there is an understanding with the gentleman who has introduced this bill, and therefore I shall make no objection with the amendments he is going to offer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, what is the understanding?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman would have heard him state it had he been paying attention.

Mr. MURDOCK. No; this was a secret caucus, and I did not get in.

Mr. STAFFORD. There was no secret caucus at all. It was that $90,000 would be recommended——

Mr. MURDOCK. I have been paying attention, but I could not hear the caucus between the gentleman from Wisconsin and the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is always fearful of a caucus——

Mr. MURDOCK. I certainly am.

Mr. STAFFORD. When it relates to just a change of phraseology.

Mr. MURDOCK. I am suspicious of a caucus.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman conjures up too many idle, wild fears.

Mr. MURDOCK. I conjure them up in my own rights in this case. What is the understanding the gentleman from Tennessee had with the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will be glad to read it to the gentleman:

That the same is hereby amended so as to——

Mr. LOBECK. Is this a conference?

Mr. McKELLAR. No, sir; it is a conference in the House.

That the same is hereby amended so as to change the limit of cost heretofore fixed for said object from $40,000—to a limit of cost of $100,000 for said site.

Striking out the words "an aggregate of"—

Mr. MURDOCK. In part. The gentleman from Wisconsin wanted it $75,000. But go ahead.

Mr. McKELLAR (reading):

That any unexpended balance of this appropriation for said site is hereby made available for the building; and that the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated, under said new limit, to be immediately available, said sum, or as much as may be necessary, to be used for the enlargement of the present site.

Mr. MURDOCK. That was the agreement?

Mr. McKELLAR. That was the agreement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Is there a committee amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; it is an amendment which I am offering on the floor. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out, in line 8, page 1 of the bill, the words "an aggregate of."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 8, strike out the words "an aggregate of."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out, in line 9, on page 1, the figures "$100,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$90,000."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, in line 10, page 1, I move to strike out the word "the" and insert in lieu thereof the word "this."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 10, after the words "balance of," strike out the word "the" and insert in lieu thereof the word "this."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. And in the same line strike out the words "heretofore or herein made."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 10, strike out the words "heretofore or herein made."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. And in line 11, page 1, strike out the words "and building are" and the words "for both" and insert after the word "site" the word "is."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 11, strike out the words "and building are"; and at the end of the line strike out the words "for both"; and after the words "site," in the same line, insert the word "is," so that the line as amended will read:

"Said site is hereby made available."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. And in line 12, on page 1, strike out the words "land and" and insert in lieu thereof the words "for the."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 12, strike out the words "land and" and insert in lieu thereof the words "for the."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. And in the same line, on page 1, strike out the figures "60,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "50,000."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 12, strike out the figures "$60,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$50,000."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. And in line 3, page 2, strike out the comma after the word "necessary" and place a period in lieu thereof, and strike out the words "to be used for the enlargement of the present site."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 3, strike out all after the word "necessary," which is the following language: "To be used for the enlargement of the present site."

Mr. MANN. What goes in there?

Mr. McKELLAR. The amendment is to strike it out entirely at the end of the sentence.

Mr. MANN. That leaves it this way:

To be immediately available, said sum, or as much of said sum as may be necessary.

We have appropriated $50,000 to be immediately available, or as much of said sum as may be necessary.

Mr. McKELLAR. The $40,000 is already available.

Mr. MANN. You had better strike out all after the word "limit." "To be immediately available" is not necessary.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will accept the amendment. I move to strike out all of the words after the word "limit," in line 1, page 2, and the rest of the paragraph.

Mr. MANN. That will give you an appropriation of $50,000 in addition to what you already have, which can be used for the building if there is anything left for the site.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is right.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 1, 2, and 3, after the word "limit," strike out the following: "to be immediately available, said sum, or as much of said sum as may be necessary, to be used for the enlargement of the present site."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as there has been so much trouble in making up this bill, had we not better have the bill read a third time instead of by the title?

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent to have it read.

Mr. MURDOCK. I ask unanimous consent to have it read as amended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to have the bill as amended read. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amended bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11747) to increase the limit of cost for the purchase of a site and the construction of a public building in Memphis, Tenn.

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the public building act approved March 14, 1913, authorizing the acquisition of a site of a new subpost-office building in Memphis, State of Tennessee, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to change the limit of cost heretofore fixed for said object from $40,000 to a limit of cost of $90,000 for said site; that any unexpended balance of this appropriation for said site is hereby made available for the building; and that the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated under said new limit.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the amended bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McKELLAR, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to think—I do not know that it is necessary—that we ought to insert after the word "appropriated," in line 1, page 2, the words "out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the usual language unquestionably; but I do not believe it can be done now, can it?

Mr. MANN. It can be done by unanimous consent. It should come in after the word "appropriated."

Mr. MURDOCK. The bill has been engrossed.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested that the usual words, "out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," should be inserted after the word "appropriated" in line 1 of page 2. I ask that that amendment be made.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he ask that the bill be recalled from second reading and that that amendment be made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] asks that all the proceedings touching this bill back to the amending period be vacated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Now the gentleman can offer his amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, in line 1, of page 2, after the word "appropriated," I move to insert the words "out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 1, after the word "appropriated," insert the words "out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McKELLAR, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DISPOSAL OF CERTAIN LANDS, FORT BERTHOLD RESERVATION, N. DAK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 4988) to provide for the disposal of certain lands in the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, N. Dak.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4988) to provide for the disposal of certain lands in the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, N. Dak.

Be it enacted, etc., That the lands in the Fort Bertholdt Indian Reservation, N. Dak., which on account of their containing coal were reserved from allotment and other disposition under the act of June 1, 1910, entitled "An act to authorize the survey and allotment of lands embraced within the limits of the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, in the State of North Dakota, and the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus lands after allotment, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect," shall be subject to disposal under the provisions of said act: Provided, That patents issued for such lands shall contain a reservation to the United States of any coal that such lands may contain, but any entryman shall have the right at any time before making final proof of his entry, or at the time of making such final proof, to a hearing for the purpose of disproving the classification as coal land of the land embraced in his entry, and if such land is shown not to be coal land a patent without reservation shall issue.

SEC. 2. That the coal deposits in such lands shall be subject to disposal by the United States in accordance with the provisions of the coal-land laws in force at the time of such disposal. Any person qualified to acquire coal deposits or the right to mine and remove the coal under the laws of the United States shall have the right at all times to enter upon the lands selected, entered, or patented, as provided by this act, for the purpose of prospecting for coal thereon, upon the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of a bond or undertaking to be filed with him as security for the payment of all damages to the crops and improvements on such lands by reason of such prospecting. Any person who has acquired from the United States the coal deposits in any such land, or the right to mine or remove the same, may reenter and occupy so much of the surface thereof as may be required for all purposes reasonably incident to the mining and removal of the coal therefrom, and mine and remove the coal, upon payment of the damages caused thereby to the owner thereof, or upon giving a good and sufficient bond or undertaking in an action instituted in any competent court to ascertain and fix said damages: Provided, That the entryman or the owner under such limited patent shall have the right to mine coal for use upon the land for domestic purposes at any time prior to the disposal by the United States of the coal deposits.

SEC. 3. That the President of the United States shall appoint a commission consisting of three persons to inspect, classify, appraise, and value all of the lands described in section 1 of this act that shall not have been allotted in severalty to said Indians, or granted or reserved by the terms of this act, said commission to be constituted as follows: One of the commissioners shall be a person holding tribal relations with said Indians, one a representative of the Interior Department, and one a resident citizen of the State of North Dakota. That within 20 days after their appointment said commissioners shall meet and organize by the election of one of their number as chairman. The said commissioners shall then proceed to personally inspect and classify and appraise, in 160-acre tracts, all of the remaining lands described in section 1 of this act, except section 16 and section 36. In making such classification and appraisement, said lands shall be divided into the following classes: First, agricultural land of the first class; second, agricultural land of the second class; third, grazing land; fourth, timberland; fifth, mineral land, if any. That said commissioners shall be paid a salary of not to exceed $10 per day each while actually employed in the inspection and classification of said lands, and necessary expenses, exclusive of subsistence, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, such inspection and classification to be completed within six months from the date of the organization of said commission.

SEC. 4. That for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think this is a rather important bill, and deserves some explanation before it should be put on its passage.

Mr. NORTON. I quite agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin that it is an important measure.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have some special explanation of the proviso in the first section, and also of that provision in the second section which authorizes any person to enter upon these lands and prospect as to coal and pay therefor certain damages to the owners of the surface.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill is for the purpose of opening to homestead settlement the surface rights on certain lands on the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation which, by Executive order, were withdrawn from entry under the coal-land provisions of the statutes. As shown in the letter from the Assistant Secretary, dated February 27, 1914, which appears in the committee's report on this bill, at the present time there is no existing law whereby the surface rights of these coal lands can be entered on under the homestead laws, or, for that matter, under any other land laws. No entry can be made on the surface of these lands. The surface of this land is most suitable for agricultural purposes.

Mr. MURDOCK. How extensive is this tract?

Mr. NORTON. Answering the gentleman from Kansas, I will say that, as shown by the report which accompanies this bill, the lands to be opened embrace about 115,000 acres—from 115,000 to 125,000 acres. The settlers on the surrounding lands are very desirous that these lands should be opened to settlement. There is no reason whatever that I can think of or that has been presented to me by anyone why the surface rights to these lands should not be now opened to homestead settlement.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I will state that this bill is exactly on all fours with the bill that was passed with reference to the segregation and disposition of coal lands in Oklahoma.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will ask the gentleman from North Dakota if he is seeking in the bill to dispose only of the surface rights or is seeking to dispose of the coal deposits as well?

Mr. NORTON. Only the surface rights. The bill does not affect in any way whatever the disposal of the coal in these lands.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment before he leaves the first section?

Mr. NORTON. Yes; I shall be glad to.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will call the gentleman's attention to line 10, page 2, to the word "reservation," as I did in private conversation with him a moment ago. I suggest that the word "coal" should be inserted.

Mr. NORTON. I had intended to offer that or a like amendment.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will ask the gentleman if his language is not rather indefinite? It states that any entryman shall have the right at any time before making final proof of his entry to a hearing for the purpose of disproving the classification as coal land of the land embraced in his entry, and if such land shall be shown not to be coal land a patent for that without reservation shall issue. Does not that go so far as to mean that a man would be entitled to a patent if he could at any time before making the final proof of his entry to a patent disprove that the land did not contain any coal?

Mr. NORTON. Oh, I think that would be a very strained construction to put upon that sentence.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Is not that what it says?

Mr. NORTON. No; I do not think it is. That provision there is the same provision that now applies under the general homestead laws to the lands containing coal and that are not included in Indian reservations.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. We just passed a bill to correct that this morning.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. NORTON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman that if there is any question in regard to that, it could easily be remedied by placing a period in place of the comma in line 9 after the word "entry," and striking out the balance of that language. It is superfluous. I question whether the construction that the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] has suggested could properly be placed upon it; but it is superfluous in any event.

Mr. NORTON. What is the gentleman's suggestion?

Mr. MONDELL. To insert a period instead of the comma after the word "entry," in line 9 of page 2, and strike out the balance of line 9 and all of line 10.

Mr. NORTON. I would be willing to agree to that. I think that that amendment would not change the effect of the bill in the least.

I want to reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who is in nearly every case right, but in the statement that he made that we had passed a law to correct this provision this morning he is altogether in error.

Under the existing land laws, when a homestead entryman proceeds to make proof on his land included in any coal-land withdrawal order, if he requests a hearing to disprove the coal classification, he has a right to such a hearing, and he gets it; but the chief trouble has been that this hearing is secured usually only after many, many months of waiting, on the part of the entryman, for the Interior Department to issue the necessary order for the hearing. If at the hearing the entryman disproves the allegations of the Government that the land is coal land, then, under the existing homestead laws, he has the right to an unlimited patent to the land; that is, unlimited as far as the reservation to the Government of any coal right to the land is concerned.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the House whether there is any coal, to any extent, on these lands, and what is the character of the deposits?

Mr. NORTON. The only coal in these lands is lignite coal. It is not at present of very great commercial value. There are a few tracts of land on this reservation that contain lignite coal that is of commercial value, but of this 125,000 acres, I dare say, there are not to exceed a few sections of land that contain lignite coal of any considerable commercial value.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has there been a survey by the Geological Survey to determine the character of the coal?

Mr. NORTON. Yes. I understand that the United States Geological Survey has had an examination made of these lands.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Before the gentleman proceeds further, in order that he may explain two or three provisions in the bill, I will call his attention to them. In section 3 there is a provision for the appointment of a commission, and they are to value all of the lands described in section 1 of this act. I should like to know whether they are to appraise them as to their surface value or whether they are to appraise them as to their value including any coal that the lands may contain?

Then I should like to ask the gentleman this further question. This bill requires of the commission that—

In making such classification and appraisement said lands shall be divided into the following classes: First, agricultural land of the first class; second, agricultural land of the second class; third, grazing land; fourth, timberland; fifth, mineral land, if any.

As I understand it these lands were reserved by the act of June 1, 1910, because of their mineral character, and I do not know just what you mean when you say you propose to classify them now into five different classes, one of which being mineral land.

And then I want to call attention to section 4 and to ask the gentleman if this bill is to be enacted into law should not the $10,000 which is appropriated be reimbursable out of the proceeds received from the sale of the lands to be disposed of, or moneys that may be in the Treasury to the credit of the Fort Berthold Indians from the sale of other lands on the reservation that have already been disposed of?

Mr. NORTON. Replying to the questions of the gentleman from South Dakota, I will say that I had prepared an amendment to offer to section 4, providing that this appropriation be reimbursable to the United States, and be paid out of any funds derived from the sale of these lands or any money in the Treasury belonging to the Indians on the reservation. I think it is only just and fair that that should be done.

In regard to the classification this bill provides only, and its purpose is only to permit homestead entry on the surface rights of these lands that were withdrawn from entry on account of their alleged coal character. In line 10, on page 4, it is provided that the classification shall be:

> First, agricultural land of the first class; second, agricultural land of the second class; third, grazing land; fourth, timberland; fifth, mineral land, if any.

I believe that in line 12 the words "fifth, mineral land, if any," might well be stricken out. These words are superfluous, and such classification of these lands is unnecessary.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think the words "if any" should be stricken out, but not the words "mineral land."

Mr. MURDOCK. That does not make it apply to grazing land.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NORTON. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. There are no minerals on any of these lands, are there?

Mr. NORTON. Not as far as I know.

Mr. MONDELL. Not as far as you know, except coal?

Mr. NORTON. No.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it generally understood that most of the land which has been withdrawn does contain coal of merchantable quantity?

Mr. NORTON. A very little of it contains coal.

Mr. MONDELL. A very little of it. Then, as a matter of fact, about the first thing that ought to be done is to have a further investigation made, with a view of making a nonmineral or noncoal report as to the lands which do not contain coal in fact; or do you assume that all of these lands are to be considered coal lands?

Mr. NORTON. All of this 125,000 acres is now by the order of withdrawal considered coal land.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NORTON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. In this classification and appraisement under this bill is it intended to classify and appraise anything except the surface?

Mr. NORTON. That is all.

Mr. MANN. Ought it not to be so stated? The bill as it stands provides for the classification and appraisement of all lands described in section 1. That is in section 3. And then further on it provides that the classification shall include mineral lands. Manifestly I take it that is not intended to include mineral lands, because of coal deposits. I do not know what may be under the surface, but the classification and appraisement, as I take it, is intended to cover only the surface.

Mr. NORTON. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. And this commission is not to determine whether there is coal under the surface or not?

Mr. NORTON. Not at all.

Mr. MANN. That will be left to the department through the Geological Survey or through the entryman himself.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman let me call his attention to line 2, page 2, where the bill provides that the lands shall be subject to disposal under the provision of said act; that is, the act that provided for the sale of lands other than the mineral lands. The purpose of the provision is to fix the price at which these lands are to be disposed of to the homestead settlers. Consequently, on page 3, line 18, after the word "value" there should be inserted the words "the surface of all the lands described." I presume that is what is desired.

Mr. MONDELL. Will gentlemen let me make this suggestion. Gentlemen talk about surface rights; they are very much more than surface rights, and unless the gentleman wants to change the character of the patent, unless he wants to change the title which these people are to receive, the word "surface" ought not to appear in the bill. It should be some such language as "exclusive of the coal"; some such words to that effect would be more to the point than the word "surface."

Mr. MANN. I take it that in valuing the lands the commission, not knowing whether there is coal under them or not, are not going to increase the value of the lands on the supposition that there may be coal there; all they will value will be the surface.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the matter could be provided for by an amendment, after the word "shall," in line 9, page 4, by inserting the words "without regard to the coal they may contain."

Mr. NORTON. If the gentleman will yield, I would suggest, if he desires to be so very precise and very accurate in the matter, that after the word "value" should be inserted the words "for agricultural purposes."

Mr. MONDELL. You could hardly say that in view of the fact that you are describing some lands as timber lands and some as grazing lands.

Mr. NORTON. There are no timber lands there.

Mr. MANN. I supposed that grazing was an agricultural pursuit.

Mr. MONDELL. And I suppose timber growing is an agricultural pursuit.

Mr. MANN. The forest reserves are in the Agricultural Department.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; by accident.

Mr. MANN. No; by design. The gentleman from Wyoming ought not to repudiate his own child.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask three or four questions about this bill. What does the act of June 1, 1910, provide that the price shall be, and what will the classified lands sell for under that act?

Mr. NORTON. The price was fixed by the commission, and the highest price of these lands, as I recall it, was $6.50 an acre.

Mr. FERRIS. Was not there a maximum limitation in that act?

Mr. NORTON. No; I do not think so.

Mr. FERRIS. As I recall, there is a graduated price fixed for these lands.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Not by this act. As I recall, that provided the lands should be classified just as this bill proposes to classify them, into lands of the first, second, and third class, and so forth; and the price was to be fixed by the commission. That was the price that the homesteader obligated himself to pay when he made an entry on these lands, and it was payable in annual installments.

Mr. NORTON. I have here the act of June 1, 1910 (35 Stat., 455), providing for the classification and appraisement of these lands on this reservation. I will read section 7 of the act:

> SEC. 7. That the President of the United States shall appoint a commission, consisting of three persons, to inspect, classify, appraise, and value all of the lands described in section 1 of this act that shall not have been allotted in severalty to said Indians or granted or reserved by the terms of this act, said commission to be constituted as follows: One of the commissioners shall be a person holding tribal relations with said Indians, one a representative of the Interior Department, and one a resident citizen of the State of North Dakota. That within 20 days after their appointment said commissioners shall meet and organize by the election of one of their number as chairman. That said commissioners shall then proceed to personally inspect and classify and appraise, in 160-acre tracts, all of the remaining lands described in section 1 of this act, except section 16 and section 36. In making such classification and appraisement said lands shall be divided into the following classes: First, agricultural land of the first class; second, agricultural land of the second class; third, grazing land; fourth, timberland; fifth, mineral land, if any, but the mineral and timber lands shall not be appraised. That said commissioners shall be paid a salary of not to exceed $10 per day each while actually employed in the inspection and classification of said lands and necessary expenses, exclusive of subsistence, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, such inspection and classification to be completed within six months from the date of the organization of said commission.

Mr. FERRIS. Is not there a provision in that act fixing the maximum price at which these lands are to be sold?

Mr. NORTON. No; section 9 of the same act of June 1, 1910, provides for the disposal of these lands, and reads as follows:

> SEC. 9. That said lands shall be disposed of by proclamation under the general provisions of the homestead and town-site laws of the United States and shall be opened to settlement and entry by proclamation of the President, which proclamation shall prescribe the time when and the manner in which the lands may be settled upon, occupied, and entered by persons entitled to make entry thereof, and no person shall be permitted to settle upon, occupy, or enter any of said lands except as prescribed in said proclamation: Provided, That the rights of honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors of the late Civil and Spanish Wars and Philippine insurrection, as defined and prescribed in sections 2304 and 2305 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March 1, 1901, shall not be abridged: Provided further, That the price of said agricultural lands shall be the appraised value thereof as approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and the agricultural lands shall be disposed of under the homestead law and shall be paid for in accordance with the rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior upon the following terms: One-fifth of the purchase price to be paid in cash at the time of entry and the balance in five equal installments, to be paid in two, three, four, five, and six years, respectively, from and after the date of entry. In case any entryman fails to make the annual payments, or any of them, when due, all rights in and to the land covered by his entry shall cease, and any payments theretofore made shall be forfeited and the entry canceled, and the lands shall be again subject to entry under the provisions of the homestead law at the appraised price thereof.

Mr. FERRIS. Is it not true that that act provides that each of the classifications shall sell for a specified sum?

Mr. NORTON. No; it does not.

Mr. FERRIS. Some of the Dakota lands have been sold in that way.

Mr. NORTON. But this act of June 1, 1910, does not so provide.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, just a word. Of course, the rule here is quite an old one—so old that it is almost axiomatic—that in South Dakota and North Dakota and in many of the States Indian lands are always sold for the appraised price, the act providing for the expense of a commission to appraise and providing for different methods of arriving at their true value. In our State it has been uniform that Indian lands have been invariably sold under competitive bids. I do not like to object to this bill, but still the time ought to come when the same rule would prevail for the disposition of Indian lands in all States. If it is good to sell lands in one State by competitive bids, it ought to be good to sell them in that way in other States. I have made but one objection since I have been in Congress, and that was where they were diverting some of the irrigation funds.

I do not like to object to this, but it is a common thing to hear in our State constantly that we sit here and let Indian lands be sold everywhere except in our own State on the appraised plan, providing jobs and commissions for those who appraise them, whereas in our State we auction them off at competitive bids. I think the House may as well know that by competitive bids the land nearly always brings more, which, of course, is more in the interest of the Indian. There are times when the bidders overbid themselves, and bid more than they should, and we have bills here from my State and other States which would seem to prove that the competitive bidding system is not the best way, but it seems to me that in the sale of Indian lands—it has never been followed anywhere on lands that are not Indian lands—there ought to be a well-defined method of disposing of them, and that method ought to be applicable in different States alike, so that criticism might not spring up with reference to the different methods of disposing of these lands. For instance, section 3 of the bill has a provision for an extravagant and expensive commission to go on and appraise the land. That would be avoided if they were sold at competitive bids. Section 1 sells coal land under the same provision that the original agricultural entries were sold.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. If these lands were to be sold at competitive bids, would it be necessary, and if not necessary, would it not be a good business proposition, one that would be followed, to have the value of these lands appraised for the benefit of the Indians before the sale? In that way that same expense would be incurred.

Mr. FERRIS. In some cases that has been followed. They appraised the segregated coal lands in my State. Here is an identical case with our own State. It has been quite a good deal of expense and trouble to appraise those lands. I doubted the advisability of it at the time it was passed, but there were those who were unwilling to let them sell the lands without appraisement. They were finally appraised, but the appraisement did not fix the value at which the purchaser should get them, but was there only as a safety valve upon which the lands would always be sold at competitive bids; and the surface lands soon to be sold in our State—every acre, every town lot, and every square foot—will be sold at competitive bids.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman will, of course, distinguish between the disposition of lands to homestead entrymen and selling lands outright to purchasers.

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman knows that in his State the Secretary of the Interior disposed of some lands in the Kiowa and Comanche Reservations to the highest bidder, where the purchaser was required to comply with the homestead law?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. And we have to legislate repeatedly in granting extensions to those people because of the fact that they paid too much for the lands. This tract of land, as it so happens, has no coal that is of any great commercial value. It is lignite coal, and, personally, I would prefer to have seen the coal, whatever it is, go with the land; but the gentleman, I think, will acknowledge that it is rather impracticable to dispose of lands under the homestead laws by disposing of them to the highest bidder. Where you are selling lands outright, it is a different proposition, and all this bill proposes to do is to open these lands for homestead entry and fix a price by appraisement as to what the settler will pay, and, in my opinion, I do not believe they will be able to dispose of the lands at the price the commission will put upon them. I would like to ask the gentleman who introduced the bill whether or not the lands have been filed upon to any considerable extent—the lands which were authorized to be disposed of under the act of 1910?

Mr. NORTON. The larger part of the lands appraised and open for homestead entry under the act of June 10, 1910, has been filed on. There is some of this land that was not filed on at the time the land was opened for entry and is not now filed on, apparently for the reason that the appraised price of the land was higher than anyone cared to pay for it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not true that a great many of the lands that were filed upon have been abandoned because of the high price, and whether or not the gentleman is being importuned by those who are still upon the land requesting some relief by legislation, either reducing the price or giving them their original homestead rights?

Mr. NORTON. To that I must answer in the affirmative. The price placed on some of this land by the appraisers is nearly as high a price as the title in fee simple to land of similar character can be bought for in that part of the country.

Mr. FERRIS. Again, on page 2, let me call the gentleman's attention——

Mr. NORTON. Just a moment. I take it that the gentleman in making his statement simply defines a principle that he believes should be followed.

Mr. FERRIS. Yes and no; but I have something besides that, too.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, on page 2 it is discovered by gentlemen on that side of the House—it is not a new discovery to me—beginning line 4, page 2, it says:

But any entryman shall have the right at any time before making final proof of his entry, or at the time of making such final proof, to a hearing for the purpose of disproving the classification as coal land of the land embraced in his entry, and if such land is shown not to be coal land a patent without reservation shall issue.

Now, that, of course, is a broadside invitation for every man who goes on and initiates a title by reason of purchase of surface rights to begin a campaign that he owns from the heavens clear down to the center of the earth. As soon as he gets a surface title he will then besiege the Land Office, under that language on page 2, lines 5 to 10, for a hearing for a second time and a third time, and finally he would appeal from the local office to the Land Office, and from the Land Office to the Interior Department, which may make an interminable amount of litigation thrown on the Land Office. Again, in section 4, appears, as also has been discovered on the other side of the House, and it is not a new discovery to me, there is an appropriation of $10,000 for the sale of Indian lands, which is not made reimbursable.

Mr. NORTON. I have an amendment which I shall offer providing for that.

Mr. FERRIS. All right.

Mr. NORTON. Now, replying to the criticism of the gentleman from Oklahoma with regard to lines 3 to 10, inclusive, I desire to say that under existing law, and under the existing rules and regulations of the Department of the Interior, a homesteader whose land is included under a coal-land withdrawal order has a right to make at the time of submitting his proof a protest against an unlimited patent and to ask for a hearing to show that his land does not contain valuable coal deposits. If he makes such a showing and proves his contention, he is entitled to an unlimited patent to the land without any coal reservation to the Government. Now, we passed a bill a short time ago, the first bill on the calendar, which bill has been passed by the Senate and has been reported favorably by the House Committee on the Public Lands, to the effect that if a limited patent has been issued to a tract of land to a homesteader, and subsequently he is able to prove by proper evidence that the land is not coal land in fact, then he is entitled to an unlimited patent to the land.

Mr. FERRIS. From the phraseology of the bill the effect is that these people who first bought surface rights will attempt to control the situation. I do not desire to prevent the bill being considered in any way, and I am not going to object; but there are four or five important questions in this bill—surface rights, separation from the coal, and so forth—which seem to me to be of importance.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this bill was read before, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order to offer amendments without reading the bill further, in order to expedite business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NORTON. The committee amendments are to be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 14, after the word "disposal," insert the following:
"And the proceeds arising from the disposal of such coal deposits or from the leasing or working thereof shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States and shall be applied in the same manner as the proceeds derived from the disposition of the lands embraced in the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 6, after the word "thirty-six," insert the following:
"Such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment: On page 2, line 9, after the word "entry," strike out the comma and insert a period and strike out the words "and if such land is shown not to" and strike out all of line 10, page 2.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 9, after the word "entry," strike out the comma and insert a period and strike out the remainder of the paragraph, as follows:
"And if such land is shown not to be coal land, a patent without reservation shall issue."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, to meet the objection of some of the gentlemen of the House to section 3, to show that only the surface rights or the agriculture value of the land may be appraised, I offer the following amendment: On page 4, in line 9, after the word "shall" insert the following: "without regard to the coal they may contain."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 9, after the word "shall," insert the words "without regard to the coal they may contain."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I will call the gentleman's attention to section 3, line 19, after the word "act," "that shall not have been allotted in severalty to said Indians or granted by the terms of this act." I desire to ask the gentleman if it is not surplusage. There is nothing in this act which reserves or grants any lands, and lands were not allotted; and consequently, it seems to me, those words might go out.

Mr. NORTON. I think they should be stricken out.

Mr. MONDELL. Let me suggest to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE], that after the word "Indians" the words "or granted or reserved by the terms of this act" should come out.

Mr. NORTON. Line 20, page 3, after the word "Indians," strike out "or granted or reserved by the terms of this act."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, lines 20 and 21, after the word "Indians," in line 20, strike out the following:
"Or granted or reserved by the terms of this act."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from North Dakota.

The question was taken and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: On page 4, line 12, after the word "timberland," strike out the semicolon and insert in lieu thereof a period; and strike out the words, "fifth, mineral land, if any."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 12, after the word "timberland," strike out the semicolon and insert a period; and strike out the words, "fifth, mineral land, if any."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment now which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Dakota offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 16, after the word "appropriated," strike out the period and insert a colon and add the following:
"Provided, That the said appropriation shall be reimbursed to the United States from the proceeds received from the sale of lands described herein or from any money in the Treasury belonging to said Indian tribe."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. To what line does the gentleman's amendment apply?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As it was reported it said "line 16."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is at the end of the bill, as I understand it.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman evidently desires to offer his amendment at the end of the bill.

Mr. NORTON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Then modify your amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from North Dakota ask unanimous consent to modify his amendment?

Mr. NORTON. I ask unanimous consent to do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered. And, without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 23, after the word "appropriated," strike out the period and insert a colon and add the following:
"Provided, That the said appropriation shall be reimbursed to the United States from the proceeds received from the sale of lands described herein or from any money in the Treasury belonging to said Indian tribe."

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I suggest, instead of "said Indian tribe," it be amended to read "the Indians of Fort Berthold Indian Reservation." The words "said Indians" do not appear anywhere here.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that amendment be agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment as follows, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Change the last line of the amendment to read as follows:
"Or from any money in the Treasury belonging to the Indians of the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation."

Mr. FERRIS. I want to inquire, either of the gentleman from North Dakota or the chairman of the committee, if this is the usual reimbursement provision? I do not have it before me.

Mr. NORTON. That is the language that is contained in the act of June 1, 1910.

Mr. FERRIS. I think it ought to be uniform.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the modification requested? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. NORTON a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FITZHENRY. Mr. Speaker, a day or two ago the governor of Illinois issued a proclamation providing for the observance of April 15 as "Good Roads Day," and in this connection I want to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and insert the proclamation, together with a brief address of the First Assistant Postmaster General in reference to post roads and good roads day celebration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FITZHENRY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the matter indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have a vague recollection that there was an address delivered by the First Assistant Postmaster General on good roads, heretofore incorporated in the RECORD. Now, can the gentleman inform the House whether this address is the same as the former one?

Mr. FITZHENRY. This is not the same address. I will say to the gentleman that this is an address that was delivered at the convention of second and third class postmasters on October 21, 1913.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand from my colleague, the gentleman from Connecticut, that that has already been incorporated.

Mr. FITZHENRY. No; I understand from Mr. Roper, the First Assistant Postmaster General, that this address has never been published. Similar addresses have been.

Mr. STAFFORD. With that statement, of course, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FITZHENRY]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PUBLIC BUILDING, MANDAN, N. DAK.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11254) to increase the limit of cost for the erection and completion of the United States Post Office Building at Mandan, N. Dak.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to erect, complete, and furnish the post-office building at Mandan, State of North Dakota, provided for in existing legislation, the limit of cost heretofore fixed by Congress be, and the same is hereby, increased in and by the sum of $60,000, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to enter into contract for the erection and completion of said building within the limit of cost herein established.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Amend, in line 7, page 1, by striking out "$60,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$11,000."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON], of what material is this building to be erected?

Mr. NORTON. What material? Why, I anticipate that it will be built of limestone.

Mr. FOSTER. Entirely?

Mr. NORTON. Well, yes; I so understand. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that this appropriation is for the purpose of supplying a sufficient fund to erect the building according to the plans that have already been drawn. The plans for this building were drawn something like a year ago, and the bids were advertised for last fall on two different occasions. The bids that were submitted were approximately $10,000 in excess of the amount available for the construction of the building.

The Supervising Architect in the Treasury Department was of the opinion that $60,000 additional should be provided for the Federal building at this place, and that the plans should be changed so as to provide a building of larger dimensions to meet the future needs of that town. But the people there are anxious to have the building constructed at the earliest possible time, and in a public meeting, I am advised, they decided that they would prefer to have this building, of the dimensions proposed, constructed at once rather than be obliged to wait three or four years for a larger building.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NORTON. I should be glad to.

Mr. MANN. Where does the information come from in reference to the Treasury Department wanting $60,000 more? Where does that information come from?

Mr. NORTON. I make that part of the statement on my own account, based on consultation and conversation with Mr. Wenderoth, the Supervising Architect, and his assistant. If the gentleman will read the letter——

Mr. MANN. Oh, I have read it. It does not agree with that statement.

Mr. NORTON. It supplies evidence which I believe in part corroborates the statement I have made.

Mr. MANN. Let us see. I do not question the gentleman's statement, although I never think it advisable to repeat an oral conversation had with any executive officer.

Mr. NORTON. I shall cheerfully bear that suggestion in mind in the future.

Mr. MANN. That is right. It is advisable to remember it, because you may be assured that people do not stand up to all statements which conflict with written statements that they make. The Secretary of the Treasury in his estimate states:

It is estimated that the building as designed can be built, provided the limit of cost be increased in the amount of $20,000, but it would not provide for all branches of the service, nor is the area sufficient to provide for reasonable future growth.

There is no statement that anybody has been able to extract, except the oral statement of the gentleman, about the $60,000.

Mr. NORTON. I realize that fully. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that probably I am violating the good advice that he just gave me by saying that a letter was prepared by Mr. Wenderoth's office, recommending that an appropriation of $60,000 be granted; but for the reason that it would delay the construction of the building, and for the reason that I was advised that the people of Mandan desired that the building be constructed at once, I asked that that recommendation be withheld. I have urged the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to recommend an amount sufficient to construct the building according to the plans now drawn.

Mr. MANN. Let us see. For this building they now have $43,000 left out of the appropriation of $55,000. Is that correct?

Mr. NORTON. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. Then they cut it down to $39,000 by deducting funds for equipment and contingencies; but including the amount available for those things they have $43,000. They have bids for construction in the sum of $44,400, which is $5,400 more than the amount that is available?

Mr. NORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Now, why do they need $20,000, or even $11,000, much less $60,000?

Mr. NORTON. The bid of $44,400 was made on the basis of the present plan being cut down or revised, and part brick construction supplied instead of stone.

Mr. MANN. I do not know how that may be. Here is a statement in the letter:

The work was placed on the market in August, 1913, and but one bid was obtained, in amount $48,995, which was rejected on account of its being in excess of the amount available.

Now, that was the bid invited on the first plans prepared, $48,995, or practically $49,000. Then they advertised for bids again, on the same basis as before, and received a bid of $44,400. They strike off $5,400 on readvertisement. I do not know, but possibly if they had advertised it the third time they could have built it within the limit of the appropriation.

Mr. NORTON. Probably stone is getting a little cheaper.

Mr. MANN. There is no change in the plans?

Mr. NORTON. There is no change of plans, but I suggest that probably stone and labor are a little cheaper in the later bid.

Mr. STAFFORD. It says so. There was cheaper construction. The second bid was $49,400, but with the alternative of cheapening the construction at $44,400. There was only $39,000 of the $44,400 for construction proper available, and if you are going to build it for $49,000 it would require at least $10,000 for the desired building.

Mr. MANN. Well, let us find out about it. The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] introduces a bill to increase the limit of cost $60,000. Do I understand that the gentleman in the bill intended to increase the limit by $60,000, or to raise it up to $60,000?

Mr. NORTON. I intended to increase it $60,000.

Mr. MANN. There was a difference of only $5,400 between the bid and the appropriation. The committee very generously on the one side cut the gentleman down from $60,000 to $11,000 and raised the amount that would be available from the difference between $44,400 and $39,000, or $5,400, to $11,000. Which does the gentleman propose now to take?

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman proposes now to take—and will be very grateful for it—an amount sufficient to build the building under the plans now drawn for its construction.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. And how much is that, if I may inquire?

Mr. NORTON. I think it should be $15,000 at least. We are getting in this bill, as amended by the committee, only $11,000.

Mr. MANN. We have had four sums proposed—$60,000, $15,000, and $11,000, and I have suggested the difference between the existing appropriation and the bids, $5,400.

Mr. NORTON. Is the gentleman willing to add them up and take an average?

Mr. MANN. Well, we are not a jury, and we do not do it that way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, just a moment. I have been listening to the colloquy between the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from North Dakota, and have not had an opportunity to interrogate them. Was there a change of material proposed to be made in this bill?

Mr. NORTON. There was—the second time it was advertised in the alternate plans.

Mr. FOSTER. Were the advertisements made for both kinds of material—brick and stone, or for stone only?

Mr. NORTON. I could not inform the gentleman accurately as to that. I think, though, that the plans provided for stone construction or brick construction.

Mr. FOSTER. For both kinds of construction?

Mr. NORTON. Yes; I am inclined to think that is true.

Mr. FOSTER. And this difference is called for in order to make it stone? Is that it?

Mr. NORTON. This difference is called for in order to construct the building under the lowest bid that was made on the original plans.

Mr. FOSTER. The lowest bid under the last advertisement was for a building of brick and stone, was it not?

Mr. NORTON. I understood that the bid of $48,995, or approximately $49,000, was for a construction of limestone.

Mr. FOSTER. Instead of brick and stone?

Mr. NORTON. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. How large a place is Mandan?

Mr. NORTON. Mandan is a place of about 5,000 people. It is a railroad division point, and within the last few years two lines of railroad have been built leading out of that town, one running about 100 miles north and the other running about 120 miles south.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not the gentleman think that a building could be constructed out of stone and brick that would answer the needs of that community, so far as post business is concerned?

Mr. NORTON. Why, they are getting along now with part of a building constructed of brick. They have gotten along for more than 30 years with very poor building accommodations. I think they are now entitled to a first-class modern post-office building of the very best construction.

Mr. FOSTER. There is nothing but a post office to be located there, is there?

Mr. NORTON. There is a Government experimental station located there.

Mr. MANN. And a store or two. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORTON. And, as the gentleman from Illinois so wisely remarks, a store or two, and then some.

Mr. FOSTER. And I think they change the time there from central to western time. I have been through Mandan, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Then what more does the gentleman want to know? [Laughter.]

Mr. NORTON. If the gentleman from Illinois has been through Mandan, I am sure he will support an amendment for an increase of the amount of the appropriation as recommended by the committee.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say that I went through as quickly as I could. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not believe that a stone building is absolutely necessary. I think they can get along with one of brick and stone.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hope the gentleman is not going to object.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, let me suggest this to the gentleman: There are a number of these bills on the calendar increasing the limit of cost of public buildings. These bills have been reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. If the committee brought in an omnibus bill, which is the usual method of legislating in regard to these public buildings, it would pass without difficulty, and probably the increases would be considerably larger in the main than they are when brought in in individual bills. Now, it is perfectly manifest that the House itself, sitting as the House, can not differentiate between these bills. In the hurry of the moment, in the consideration of the Unanimous Consent Calendar, we have not the facilities for determining whether one bill increasing the limit of cost $100,000 or more for a public building is proper and another bill doing the same thing is improper. We have either got to leave that to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in the main, or else, in my opinion, we can not pass any more of these bills. In other words, if the committee follows its present custom, which is new so far as my term of service is concerned, in reporting individual bills for increasing the limit of cost instead of an omnibus bill, we have got to settle what our practice is going to be. The omnibus bill is always passed when it is reported. Sometimes there are kicks about it. I have noticed that some gentlemen who do not have anything in it sometimes kick, but never effectively. I think they never try to kick very effectively. Now, shall we object to the consideration of these individual bills and force the committee, if it wants to get action, to bring in an omnibus bill that will carry a great deal more than the individual bills, or shall we take our chances in following the committee on the individual bills?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me just a moment?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to say to the gentleman——

Mr. MANN. I hope what the gentleman says will be pleasant. I am defending his committee just now. I was not defending it a while ago.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I hope it will be pleasant. I was about to remark that I am very glad the gentleman has just made that statement. If we brought in an omnibus bill here, as the gentleman has just stated, these items would, of course, be much larger, and almost anything would go through. The gentleman understands that.

It was understood that at this session of Congress there would be no omnibus bill. A number of gentlemen, like the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON], have been before us with emergency matters, and the committee has done the best it could to sift out those that were not urgent, and to treat with those alone that we considered urgent and which ought to be passed at this time. The committee may make mistakes, and undoubtedly has and will; but in this case, for instance, I think $20,000 was recommended here as the increase; but the subcommittee that had the bill in charge went into it thoroughly and came to the conclusion that $11,000 would be ample to complete it, and the full committee accepted their recommendation.

It seems to me that if gentlemen want to object to these bills, it is going in the end to cost the Government a great deal more money than it will if they accept the bills as they are. If this matter goes along, it may be that this building will cost the United States Government several times $11,000 before they get through with it. Of course, my friend from Illinois——

Mr. MANN. Of course, as far as objecting is concerned, we are entitled to object.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I understand you are entitled to object.

Mr. MANN. I was trying to see if we could get some understanding as to what we would do about these bills.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have no interest in it, and no pride of opinion as to any of these bills. If these gentlemen want to object, they can do it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I should like to ask the gentleman just what is meant by his statement that it may cost the Government several times $11,000 if this bill is not passed?

Mr. MANN. They are asking for $60,000, and this proposes to give them $11,000. They insist they ought to have $60,000.

Mr. NORTON. And we will get it, if we have to wait until the next Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If it is not done under this arrangement and goes over until next winter when we have an omnibus bill, the probability is that $50,000 or $60,000 will be found in the bill for this project and everybody will vote for it because everybody will have "a finger in the pie." That is the whole story, and we might as well be plain about it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman from Florida think that this $11,000 is necessary?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Upon what theory would the committee proceed that next year they would give $60,000?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am not discussing on what theory the committee might proceed, I am simply telling the gentleman what his experience in Congress should have taught him will happen, and it is true.

Mr. MANN. The joke of this is that a member of the River and Harbor Committee should ask such a question. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORTON. I will answer the gentleman from Mississippi. The appropriation of $11,000 in this bill contemplates the construction of a building under the plans now drawn. In the letter which is signed by Secretary McAdoo personally, after being carefully considered by his assistant, it is suggested that this building as now planned will not and does not provide for all branches of the service, nor is the area sufficient to provide sufficiently for the future growth of the town. As suggested by the gentleman from Florida, if the construction is delayed a year or two we will certainly ask Congress for a larger building.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no; the gentleman will then be asking for a public building for some other place, and he will forget about this.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Not in any spirit of controversy, but asking for information which I have not yet received, I want to ask if the building ought to be larger and to cost $60,000, how does the gentleman think he can get along with $11,000? And if they ought to have $60,000 and you only appropriate $11,000, what is there to prevent their getting $60,000 in the future?

Mr. NORTON. Sixty thousand dollars would provide for a larger building and for the future growth and needs of the town; but it would delay the construction of the building. If that appropriation was made, it would place the building on the delayed list, and would probably postpone the construction three or four years.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Eleven thousand dollars is not going to give the building that they ought to have and that the service requires.

Mr. NORTON. My best judgment is that they should have a larger building; but their commercial club held a meeting, and they concluded that they would prefer to have this building constructed as now planned at the earliest date possible, because they are in urgent need of more room for the post office, rather than wait three or four years for a larger building.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I hope it is not the intention of the gentleman, or that he is not possessed with the hope in his own mind that he might get $49,000 put on in another body connected with this.

Mr. NORTON. No; I have had so much trouble and worry thus far with this bill as amended that I have not gone into that realm of speculation.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems that the building was to be built of brick and stone, and now with $11,000 it is to be of stone alone. I do not understand where the bids come in on the brick and stone building combined. It is not revealed by anything in the report. My colleague spoke of the matter of taking these bills as they come from the committee. I have a great deal of respect for the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, but I do not know that we should take the reports of the committee on matters of this kind. I realize what it is to have the importunities of Members trying to get an increase of appropriation, and that they are sometimes hard to withstand. Each Member thinks that he has a good case and puts it up to the committee the best he can. The committee is not always acquainted with the facts, and they do the best they can. It is a hard-worked committee and endeavoring to do the best thing possible for the public good, except sometimes when they slip in a public building that ought not to be authorized.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I happen to be a chairman of one of the subcommittees of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I know that every subcommittee is working to keep out all of these bills possible at this session and only report those that are known to be strict emergency propositions. We had a meeting of my subcommittee a few days ago, and some seven Members appeared before it. Each one had a proposition that he thought came within the rule, but the committee only reported one bill and a small amount at that. I know that is true of the other subcommittees. Not one bill in twenty gets a favorable report.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not complaining of the committee at all. I hope the gentleman from Ohio does not understand me that way at all. I know that the committee is rendering conscientious service in these individual cases. Still I might not agree to all the reports, not being acquainted with all the facts of the case. Mr. Speaker, I am going to withdraw any objection in this case with the hope that there will not be anything added to this more than to make up the $60,000.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question from some one familiar with this case. I see that the chairman of the committee does not know anything about it. I will ask the gentleman from North Dakota what is the total cost of the building, and what has been expended, and what is asked for now?

Mr. NORTON. I will be glad to inform the gentleman. Under the original bill authorizing the construction of this building the expenditure was limited to $55,000 for building and site. The site has been purchased for $12,000, leaving a balance of $43,000. Of this amount $39,000 is available for the construction of the building. With the appropriation recommended by the committee, that would make $50,000 for the building.

Mr. DONOVAN. How much was paid for the site?

Mr. NORTON. Twelve thousand dollars.

Mr. DONOVAN. It is in Mandan, N. Dak.?

Mr. NORTON. Yes.

Mr. DONOVAN. I understood the gentleman to say that the population of the place was about 5,000?

Mr. NORTON. Between 5,000 and 6,000.

Mr. DONOVAN. The census report makes it 3,800. What are the total receipts of the office?

Mr. NORTON. Approximately $15,000 yearly.

Mr. DONOVAN. Less or more?

Mr. NORTON. More.

Mr. DONOVAN. The postal books make it less. Does not the gentleman think that this ought to be passed over and have some one here who knows more about the facts of the case? As I say, the post-office report makes it less than $15,000 and the population is only 3,800. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds does not seem to know much about it. Why should they? They are only here about half of the time; they spend more of their time going away here and there and everywhere else, but don't seem to attend much to business. [Laughter.]

The reason for that is that it is understood there shall be no public building appropriations for this session. I think that is probably the reason they have not attended to their business. I suggest now to the gentleman, to avoid an objection, that he allow this matter to pass over without prejudice, and get the necessary information, for, so far, I have not heard a single statement made that is true. All of them are exaggerated. Here is the reason for this, here is what is going on in that country all the time in the public building line. I had no idea this committee had an itch of that sort. There has been nearly half a million dollars expended in four places in that country, and the total population combined of the four places is less than 10,000. Here is a little place of 3,800 inhabitants. I can not, for the life of me as a Member of this body, understand the gall, so to speak, that prompts anyone to ask for such an appropriation for such a small place.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONOVAN. I will be delighted to yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman spoke of the population being 3,800 according to the census?

Mr. DONOVAN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. That census is four years old.

Mr. DONOVAN. It will take a great many more four years to help out some of those little localities in population.

Mr. COOPER. There have been some new railroads built there, as I understand.

Mr. DONOVAN. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin this, that nearly half a million dollars have been expended for four buildings in four different towns in that locality, and the total population of the four towns is less than 10,000. That is public building construction gone mad.

Mr. COOPER. Of course, I assume what the gentleman says is correct——

Mr. DONOVAN. Oh, I can refer the gentleman to a very intelligent Member from that country, Mr. MONDELL. It is in his territory, and he will tell you what I say is true.

Mr. COOPER. I will say to the gentleman from Connecticut, if his statement is true, that because some improvident appropriations have been made in other places would not affect the merits of the proposition now before the House.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman realizes that no information has yet been given to the House.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONOVAN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. We have been giving information here for half an hour or more.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman from Illinois made an observation from his seat. He is always in order; I did not think he would do that. I would like to know what he has to say?

Mr. MANN. I say that we have been giving information to the gentleman for an hour. I am sorry the gentleman did not hear.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to answer the gentleman's question and give him all of the information that can be given. I live right near Mandan, and I have been very well acquainted with the town for a number of years. I do not think there is anything about the place concerning which I am not informed. I will say that Mandan is a division point on the main line of the Northern Pacific Railroad. It is just across the Missouri River from Bismarck, the capital of my State.

Mr. DONOVAN. Oh, we do not care anything about that, brother. What we want to know is its receipts and its population, to determine whether this is a business transaction or a foolish expenditure.

Mr. NORTON. I will say to the gentleman that I consider it a good business transaction to construct this building at this time.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman evidently does not know the population. The population, according to the census, is 3,800, and he says it is 5,000. He does not know the receipts, because he exaggerated them. I suggest that he ask that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. NORTON. I trust the gentleman will not object to this bill, because I very much desire that it be passed at this time.

Mr. DONOVAN. I make that suggestion to the gentleman so that we may wait until he gets some information.

Mr. NORTON. I will say to the gentleman that I shall be very glad to give him all the information he desires, and give it to him now. Mandan is a rapidly growing western town. The gentleman must remember that towns in North Dakota are different from towns in Connecticut. There is no doubt that within a year Mandan will increase in population at least a thousand. This increased population will be largely due to the settling up of the farm lands north of there on the line of the new railroad that was built out of Mandan last summer.

Mr. DONOVAN. How do we know the gentleman is familiar with that situation when he does not know the census, when he does not know what any child ought to be able to get hold of? How are we going to guess?

Mr. NORTON. I have the census of Mandan as given in 1910.

Mr. DONOVAN. What was it in 1910?

Mr. NORTON. It was 3,873; about 3,800, as the gentleman said.

Mr. DONOVAN. Why did the gentleman say 5,000?

Mr. NORTON. I know the population is now more than 5,000. They have an Elks' lodge there now, and this order in my State requires that a town have a population of at least 5,000 before a charter for a lodge is granted to it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Are we putting up public buildings for the Elks?

Mr. NORTON. No, not exactly that; but the Elks get mail the same as other people. I want to say that Mandan is a good, live, hustling, rapidly growing little city. The town and its citizenship are in every way worthy of the recognition that will be accorded them by the construction of the post-office building, for which the plans have already been drawn. The authorization for an increased appropriation provided for in this bill is necessary so that a contract for the construction of the building according to the present plans may be let at an early date. In asking for this small increased appropriation we can not be charged with being other than modest in our demands. The gentleman should not object to this bill, and I trust that he will not, and that the bill will be passed at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to erect, complete, and furnish the post-office building at Mandan, State of North Dakota, provided for in existing legislation, the limit of cost heretofore fixed by Congress be, and the same is hereby, increased in and by the sum of $60,000, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to enter into contract for the erection and completion of said building within the limit of cost herein established.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 7, strike out the figures "$60,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$11,000."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. NORTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMENDING ACT, RIVERS AND HARBORS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 14331) to amend section 19 of an act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1899.

The Clerk read the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know why we should not put this bill back on the regular calendar for consideration in the usual way. I want to say to the gentleman frankly there are questions involved here that ought to be considered in some other way than by unanimous consent.

Mr. WATKINS. Well, it is on the regular calendar, the Union Calendar, and probably will be called up next Wednesday, and that is the reason I asked to pass this bill without prejudice.

Mr. MOORE. I suggest to the gentleman that this involves more, perhaps, than the gentleman has in mind. It takes in bays and sounds apart from the rivers and other streams which the gentleman mentions in the bill, and it seems to me to be a bill that can not be passed by unanimous consent.

Mr. WATKINS. I anticipated there would be objection, and that is one reason I have asked unanimous consent that it be passed over.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit me, what are those questions that attracted the gentleman's attention? I ask for future reference, saying to the gentleman, unless he is familiar with it, there are only three words inserted in this bill that are different from existing law.

Mr. MOORE. Then I do not know just why the bill comes in if it is the same as existing law.

Mr. WATKINS. I can explain to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. The only thing the bill does is to insert in the existing law "logs, merchantable timber."

Mr. MOORE. If that is all, then I was not familiar with it.

Mr. MANN. I did not know whether the gentleman was or was not.

Mr. MOORE. There are cases of derelicts, and the sinking of vessels by collisions or otherwise, in the bays and sounds. I would like to know as to them.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman those are already in the existing law, and the only thing this bill does is to add in three places to the existing law the words "logs, merchantable timber." That is all there is to it.

Mr. MOORE. May I ask why a bill like this, pertaining to navigation, should not be referred in the regular way to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, which has jurisdiction?

Mr. MANN. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors does not have jurisdiction; that is the trouble with some gentlemen. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors does not have jurisdiction of legislation concerning rivers. It only has jurisdiction in regard to the improvement of harbors. I am not interested in the bill.

Mr. MOORE. What is the request the gentleman from Louisiana made?

Mr. WATKINS. The request I made was that the bill be passed over until the next regular call on the calendar without prejudice.

Mr. MOORE. That will give us an opportunity to look into it, and I will not object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to pass this bill without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT PENDLETON, OREG.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13819) to increase the limit of cost of the Federal building at Pendleton, Oreg.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to erect and complete the post-office building at Pendleton, State of Oregon, provided for in existing legislation, and to provide therein accommodations for the United States courts and court officials and other Government offices, the limit of cost heretofore fixed by Congress be, and the same is hereby, increased in and by the sum of $60,000, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to enter into contract for the erection and completion of said building within the limit of cost herein established.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill, I do not know who, if at the time the court was located at Pendleton, Oreg., the plans were made for this building?

Mr. SINNOTT. If the plans were made? Yes; the court was located there when the plans were made, but the court was not located there when the original act was passed authorizing an appropriation of $70,000 for the securing of the site and the building at the limit of cost of $70,000. That was in 1908. In 1909 the terms of the Federal court were established at Pendleton. Mr. Speaker, by the act of May 30, 1908, a post-office building only was authorized at Pendleton, Oreg., the building and grounds to cost not over $70,000. The act of March 2, 1909, established terms of the Federal court at Pendleton. The grounds were purchased for $8,000, leaving available for the building, designed for post-office and court purposes, $62,000. In October, 1911, proposals were received for the construction of the building; the bids averaged $81,000; these were for a nonfireproof building. The new design contemplates a fireproof building, which will require, in the opinion of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Department, an additional authorization of $60,000.

I believe this bill presents a real emergency, both on account of the present poor post office facilities, as is shown in the report of the committee filed with the bill, and especially on account of the needs of the Federal court, which now meets in the county courthouse by the courtesy of the county court of Umatilla County. I believe an examination of the committee's report filed with the bill will demonstrate to the most exacting stickler for economy the merits of this bill as an emergency measure. While the letter—dated February 12, 1914—of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, copied in the report, shows $62,000 available for the building, in a letter to me of date March 31, 1914, he writes that after setting aside amounts sufficient for lock boxes, lamp standards, vault shelving, and so forth, and contingencies that generally arise during the construction of a building, it would not be safe to award a contract in excess of approximately $57,000. While the census does not show Pendleton to be a large town in the way you look at towns in the East, yet it has stores and banks which would compare favorably with any of those in Washington. It is the home of the greatest show on earth, the Pendleton "round-up," where some 60,000 people from all over the United States gather every year to witness cowboy feats and exhibitions of horsemanship and Indian life, a show fit to be staged in the Colosseum in the palmy days of the Roman Empire.

Mr. FOSTER. Is this increase asked for solely on account of the Federal court being located there?

Mr. SINNOTT. Well, and on account of the inadequacy of the allowance to build the building. The original amount was $70,000. Eight thousand dollars was expended for the site, and the Secretary of the Treasury reports that when the bids were let the general average of the bids were $81,000 for the building; that there really was available for the building itself about $57,000.

Mr. FOSTER. If this increase were made, it would permit them to build a building that would better take care of the post office and the Federal court. I understand there is a postal division there.

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; a postal division.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it is all right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, let me ask the gentleman—I did not hear—what is the population of this town?

Mr. SINNOTT. Four thousand four hundred and sixty, according to the Census of 1910. The patrons of the post office number 6,500.

Mr. DONOVAN. What are the gross receipts?

Mr. SINNOTT. Twenty-four thousand dollars.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman the receipts 10 years ago were $10,500 and they are now $24,000, and the Federal court is now located there.

Mr. DONOVAN. Is this money for the building or the building and site?

Mr. SINNOTT. This money is to build the building.

Mr. DONOVAN. The site is already furnished?

Mr. SINNOTT. The site was acquired four years ago.

Mr. DONOVAN. What is the total amount altogether for it?

Mr. SINNOTT. This will make a total of $130,000.

Mr. DONOVAN. Well, I must say you people are liberal. Why did not you put it half a million dollars? Why do you limit it to this certain amount?

Mr. MANN. Would my friend from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] permit me to call his attention to the fact that apparently they were quite economical when they bought a site and paid only $8,000 for it.

Mr. PAYNE. Does not the gentleman think that such economy ought to be rewarded?

Mr. MANN. I think it is entitled to consideration.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand the gentleman to say that when they originally contemplated this building and fixed the first limit it was simply for a post office. Since then there has been a court established there, and this is for a courthouse and post office, both.

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. And naturally that would cost more money.

Mr. DONOVAN. Is there any member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds here?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] is in the Chamber.

Mr MANN. There are several members of the committee here.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. What is the question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] wanted to propound a question to some member of the committee

Mr. DONOVAN. What is the gross amount of the appropriation? What will it amount to?

Mr. CANTRILL. About $130,000; and I desire to say to the gentleman from Connecticut——

Mr. DONOVAN. Let me ask you one more question, and you can answer both at the same time. Is it the purpose of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to give $130,000 buildings for every four or five thousand population throughout the country? Now, I wait for an answer.

Mr. CANTRILL. That is not the purpose.

Mr. DONOVAN. That is what you do, is it not?

Mr. CANTRILL. If the gentleman will permit me, I think I can answer his question satisfactorily. I desire to say in reference to this proposition that it is in strict accord with all the rules under which the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is operating. The amount appropriated is in accordance with the rules to cover such propositions throughout the country in towns of this size; that is, the amount. Now, the gentleman will evidently see that it is a question of economy to cover the branches of this Government into one building. The appropriation has been made for the post-office building. Since then the Federal court has been established, and the Federal court to-day is being held in the county courthouse there, and the gentleman can readily see that it is a matter of economy and good business, while this bill is pending, to add a sufficient amount so that all the branches of the Federal Government can be concentrated into the one building.

Mr. DONOVAN. Let me ask the gentleman. I made the statement a moment ago that nearly half a million dollars was appropriated by Congress for four buildings in four different localities the total population of which was less than 10,000. Now, is it the purpose of this committee to throw money wildly away in localities of that character? For instance, we just voted an appropriation in a town called Mandan, N. Dak.—$12,000 for a lot. It is a little place of 1,300 inhabitants.

Now, it is a rule in my section that the localities and towns are willing to give a lot on which to erect a building. Now, are you people being buncoed, or what is it? What causes you to give such an appropriation? What causes you to waste money in that way? That is the point. There is no business there to remunerate the Government in putting up a building of that character.

Mr. CANTRILL. In answer to that, Mr. Speaker, I will say if the gentleman will read the report he will find that the Treasury Department estimates that this is the amount required to construct this building, and I do not think the gentleman's statement that there is no business there will hold good, because the postal receipts there show there is a considerable business, and the fact that there is a Federal court established there shows there is considerable business of the Federal Government transacted. This is to put them all in one building.

Mr. DONOVAN. The public business in a town or State of that character can be done in a few days of the year. It does not take much space. There is more in the name than there is in the business. The fact remains that you are tossing money away as if it were dry leaves in localities of that character. This may have some advantages as compared to some of them, but when the amount reaches $500,000 for 10,000 population, divided amongst four towns, it is public building going mad. It is bribery of the community pure and simple.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DONOVAN. This gentleman rises, and he wants to tell me something. [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHBROOK. Before the gentleman is seated, I would like to ask him a question. I would like to ask the gentleman where those four items that he has been criticizing were put in—in the House or in the Senate?

Mr. DONOVAN. They were an act of Congress.

Mr. ASHBROOK. But they were Senate items.

Mr. DONOVAN. They were an act of Congress. They go through here. The four towns are in the State of Wyoming. Where is this gentleman that knows it all? [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHBROOK. We know about the Wyoming propositions, and you know how they got in there, and you ought not to criticize the House committee.

Mr. DIES. I want to ask the gentleman if he realizes that this bill can not pass unless every Member of Congress gives his consent to it?

Mr. DONOVAN. I think that is a little bit overdrawn. We come in here and think we are independent, and we think we have something to say; but who has anything to say? I would like to know who has anything to say?

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DIES. Under the rules, can not the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] object and stop the passage of this bill?

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman can not get the floor with a parliamentary inquiry and interrupt me in that way. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] is entirely correct on that proposition.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to finish my reply to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES]. Now, the inference is that it is my fault, perhaps. Ah, as to my distinguished friend from Texas, we have listened to him for hours at a time; but, just the same, when a bill comes along affecting Texas, he is wearied with well-doing. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, my parliamentary inquiry was addressed to the Chair for the benefit of my friend from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN]. He said the bill was entirely worthless and a waste of money, and I thought, in view of his statement, that he ought to know that he could stop the bill by objecting to it if he wanted to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. [Laughter.] This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13819) to increase the limit of cost of Federal building at Pendleton, Oreg.

Be it enacted, etc., That to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to erect and complete the post-office building at Pendleton, State of Oregon, provided for in existing legislation, and to provide therein accommodations for the United States courts and court officials and other Government offices, the limit of cost heretofore fixed by Congress be, and the same is hereby, increased in and by the sum of $60,000, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to enter into contract for the erection and completion of said building within the limit of cost herein established.

The SPEAKER. Before the Chair puts the question on the passage of the bill, he wants to state to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] and to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] and to everybody else that the gentleman from Connecticut was right when he claimed that the Chair ought not to have recognized the gentleman from Texas to make a parliamentary inquiry, thereby taking him off the floor.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I had the floor, and the gentleman rose in order that he might answer a question in my time.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Texas was right to make the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. DIES. Decidedly so. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CANTRILL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RELIEF OF SETTLERS WITHIN A LAND GRANT.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 5890) for the relief of settlers within the limits of the grant to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge & Vicksburg Railroad Co.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

CARIBOU NATIONAL FOREST RESERVE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 4544) to reserve certain lands and to incorporate the same and make them a part of the Caribou National Forest Reserve.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4544) to reserve certain lands and to incorporate the same and make them a part of the Caribou National Forest Reserve.

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-described lands, to wit, the east half of section 23 and all of sections 26 and 35, township 11 south, range 45 east, base meridian; also sections 1 and 2, east half of section 10, sections 11 to 14, inclusive, east half of section 15, east half of section 22, sections 23 to 26, inclusive, east half of section 27, and sections 31 to 36, inclusive, township 12 south, range 45 east, base meridian; also sections 1 to 5, inclusive, north half of section 10, north half of section 11, and north half of section 12, township 13 south, range 45 east, base meridian, be, and the same are hereby, reserved and withdrawn from entry and made a part of and included in the Caribou National Forest Reserve.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 3, by striking out the word "east" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "west."

Amend, page 1, line 5, by striking out the word "base" and inserting in lieu thereof the ward "Boise."

Amend, page 1, line 11, by striking out the word "base" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "Boise."

Amend, page 1, line 14, by striking out the word "base" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "Boise."

Amend, page 2, line 3, by striking out the period following the word "Reserve" and inserting a comma and adding the following words: "subject to all prior valid adverse rights."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I beg to call attention to one important item in this report which I am very much gratified to see, and that is that they have at last found in the western country some land in the public domain that is forest land. It has been stated so often here that all of this public domain is barren and a tree could not grow on it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. FOSTER. I can not yield now. It is too important a matter. [Laughter.] The statement has been made here repeatedly that all the public domain open to settlement is barren of trees and of such a character that trees could not grow on it, and I beg to call the attention of the House to this illuminating report, showing that here we have a piece of public domain that is, indeed, forest land.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I know that my good friend from Illinois speaks facetiously, but the real point in the situation here is that the little town of Montpelier, Idaho, needs this tract for a watershed, and they are not really able to pay for it even at the rate of $1.25 an acre. It is segregated land, rocky and uneven, without much value. All they desire to have done is to cover it into a forest reserve, so that it may be subject to some sort of sanitation and supervision as a means of water supply.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Perhaps the gentleman from Oklahoma may be able to give me some information.

Mr. FERRIS. I confess I do not know as much about this matter as does the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH], but I will answer to the best of my ability.

Mr. MANN. It is proposed here to reserve a little over 17,000 acres and make it a part of a forest reserve in order to furnish a water supply to a town in Idaho?

Mr. FERRIS. That is right.

Mr. MANN. Among the land reserved is a school section that has been assigned by the Government to the State of Idaho, and if this reservation be made, then the State of Idaho would have the right to take some lieu land somewhere else of more value than the section reserved by this bill. Does not the gentleman from Oklahoma think that that is asking a good deal of Congress, first, to reserve a school section that belongs to Idaho, instead of letting the State of Idaho reserve it for the benefit of its own community, and then after reserving it giving Idaho a better piece of land than we take from her, for the benefit of her community and not for our benefit?

Mr. FERRIS. It seems to me at first blush—and I am not so familiar with it as the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH]—that the gentleman from Illinois may be assuming as a fact something that is not correct. This bill simply covers into the forest reserves 17,000 acres of land.

Mr. MANN. It covers a school section.

Mr. FERRIS. Precisely. That adjoins the forest reserve. Mr. Galloway, the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, says it will be no additional expense to take care of it and police it and protect it, and it seems to me that would not be an onerous request for us to grant and so aid their city in that way.

Mr. MANN. Here they are asking us to give our land practically for the benefit of the community out there. There is a good deal of reasonableness about that; but, having done that, giving the land that we already have, then they want us to take 640 acres that practically belong to the State of Idaho and reserve it for the benefit of one of her communities, and then give to the State of Idaho in place of the 640 acres that we thus reserve land worth a good deal more than the 640 acres that we reserve. I take it that this is not valuable land?

Mr. FERRIS. No; it is very inferior land, and the report so shows.

Mr. MANN. When Idaho selects her lieu lands for it she will not take very inferior lands.

Mr. FERRIS. She probably will not have the opportunity to get any very good lands.

Mr. MANN. Is all of the public domain of Idaho so very inferior?

Mr. FERRIS. Every day we have complaints from States and other parties having the right to make lieu selections who do not do it because they can not get as good land as they now have and can not get it when they are forced to make lieu selections.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that there are hundreds of thousands of acres of school lands in Idaho that have not been exchanged and probably never will be exchanged, because there is not sufficient land of equal value for which to make the exchange. In any event it seems to me this is a case which should appeal to the House, because of the necessity of protecting the water supply of a town of about 2,000 people. This town lies very close to the mountainside, and it is simply intended that a strip of land along the west side of the reserve shall be brought within the forest reserve in order that stock may be kept off of it by the forest rangers.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand from the report, this bill seeks to enlarge the Caribou National Forest now existing?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. That is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the committee what contamination of the water supply at the base of this mountain is feared by the inhabitants?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The mountainside is used for grazing purposes, and during the spring and summer the sheepmen drive their stock up into that section, and of course the rains wash down the refuse into the water supply of the town.

Mr. STAFFORD. How far distant is this range from the town itself?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It is about 1 mile to the base of the mountain.

Mr. STAFFORD. How far is the farthermost part of the forest reserve from the town?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Several miles.

Mr. STAFFORD. There must be more than one township included in this proposal. What is the amount that is proposed to be included in this present forest reserve?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It comprises parts of several townships, as you will see from the description in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. The letter from the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior says 1,700 acres, but the report says 17,000 acres. Which is correct?

Mr. MANN. It is undoubtedly 17,000 acres. Seventeen hundred acres would take in less than 4 sections.

Mr. BOOHER. Less than 3 sections.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the chairman of the committee inform the House whether the letter of the First Assistant Secretary is correct, or whether the almost invariably infallible report of the chairman of the committee is correct?

Mr. FRENCH. I can inform the gentleman. The 1,700 acres and the 17,000 acres are confused because of the circumstance that the 17,000 acres refer to the area proposed to be embraced in the addition to the reserve. The 1,700 acres come in by being the amount of acreage in private ownership or owned by the State. That is the reason both figures have been used.

Mr. STAFFORD. So the proposal is to increase the existing forest reserve by 17,000 acres?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; less the 1,700 acres.

Mr. FERRIS. Less the privately owned land.

Mr. FRENCH. Now, I may suggest another idea in connection with this exchange of land. It has been suggested that this land will be surrendered by the State and that very valuable lands would be received in lieu thereof. During the last year or so the State of Idaho and the Federal Government have been attempting to arrange an exchange of lands so that the State of Idaho could have her lands en bloc and the Government its lands en bloc, without the State lands being interspersed throughout the lands owned by the Government. The basis of that exchange was that lands of approximately equivalent value should be exchanged. The State of Idaho furnished cruisers who went right along by the side of the cruisers of the Government, and they examined about 450,000 acres of land. The estimates of values of land and of timber were taken into consideration, and the exchanges were arranged upon the basis that the land surrendered by the State should be of equivalent character and value to the lands surrendered by the Government in the exchange. Now, I take it that that same condition would obtain here, and it could easily be written into the law, if it needs further legislation, that the exchange of land shall be for land of an approximately equivalent character.

Mr. MANN. Will either of the gentlemen from Idaho yield for a question? If this reservation be made, and this land be included in the forest reserve under the conditions named, what use can the Government make of the land?

Mr. FRENCH. About half of this land is regarded by the forestry officials as potential forestry land, and I imagine that it could be reforested.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well——

Mr. FRENCH. The other half of the area is not of forest character, and probably would remain rather a desert. And it would seem to me that the very highest use to which the land could be put would be in the protection of the water supply of the people of this town.

Mr. MANN. Now, let us see. Here you are asking the Government to give up, for the benefit of a community in Idaho, over 16,500 acres of land, which it is now renting or can rent, and assuming that the State of Idaho itself is too little or too mean to give up the use of 640 acres for the same purpose. Do you not think that is rather going the limit?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. In what way could the Government rent this land? It is a part of the public domain.

Mr. MANN. The Government could rent it. I do not know whether there is any law for the renting of the public domain.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. There is no law under which public land can be rented.

Mr. FRENCH. If it were within the forest reserve, it would probably be rented or leased under the present laws.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said the purpose of this bill was to prevent its use for grazing purposes. I suppose they might graze it.

Mr. FRENCH. Undoubtedly whatever grazing might be permitted would be handled under restrictions.

Mr. MANN. Why should we give up 16,500 acres of domain of the General Government when the State of Idaho itself refuses to give up as much as 640 acres and wants us to pay them for this land?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. According to the report of the Secretary of the Interior, this is not tillable land and can not be utilized in any way.

Mr. MANN. Our land is just as valuable as the one section.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It is worth nothing in that regard.

Mr. MANN. If it is worth nothing, why should we give to Idaho another 640 acres for her 640 acres?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. As I previously stated, the State of Idaho has hundreds of thousands of acres of school lands which it can not exchange, because it can not get land more valuable.

Mr. MANN. Here is the statement that the school land is worth nothing, and therefore we should reserve it and at the same time buy it.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman who has the floor yield to me for a question?

Mr. MANN. I do not know that I have the floor, but any one of us will yield.

Mr. BOOHER. I want to inquire what is the meaning of the phrase in the last paragraph of the report?—

The Agricultural Department reports that approximately one-half of the area is potential forest land and that the remainder is generally valuable for grazing, only a small percentage of the same being tillable.

What is the meaning of "potential forest land"? It is new language to me.

Mr. MANN. That means that if they can get an appropriation they can spend $100 to get $10 worth of forest. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOOHER. Now, I want to get a little more information. How many extra officials, rangers, clerks, and so forth, will be employed to take care of these 17,000 acres?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. According to the Secretary of Agriculture no additional expense will be incurred.

Mr. BOOHER. I have heard the Department of Forestry say that so often that I do not like to take the statement now. There will not be less than 50 forest rangers, with a corps of clerks added, and this will only add to the deficit in the Forestry Service in the next report. We will be several thousand dollars further behind than we are now.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It seems to me that the Secretary of Agriculture can be relied upon when he makes that statement.

Mr. BOOHER. Does the gentleman mean to say that you can add 17,000 acres to a forest reserve and not have more people to look after it?

Mr. STAFFORD. Where does it say in the report that there will be no additional caretakers?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. In the last paragraph.

Mr. BOOHER. Did I understand the gentleman to say that they wanted it in the forest reserve so as to prevent its being pastured?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. So that the water supply of this town can be protected by keeping the stock off the land in certain seasons of the year.

Mr. BOOHER. By putting it in the forest reservation you keep the stock off the land?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes; they regulate the use of it.

Mr. BOOHER. They do not rent the Government land on the outside of the forest reservation?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. No.

Mr. BOOHER. What is to prevent the community from regulating it? Nobody would have a right to establish a nuisance so as to destroy the water, and you can abate a nuisance at any time.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It would require help to police it, which would be expensive.

Mr. BOOHER. And you want the community to avoid the expense of caring for it by making the Government do it?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The rules of the forestry department would be observed by the stockmen under existing law. They would not go on to a forest reserve without authority.

Mr. BOOHER. Is the gentleman willing to say that if this 17,000 acres is added to the forest reserve there will not have to be employed more clerks and forest rangers than we had before?

Mr. FERRIS. The Agricultural Department says that.

Mr. BOOHER. I know; but the Forestry Bureau has said it so often, when it did not prove to be correct, that I want other authority.

Mr. FERRIS. I know there are among Members of the House some that think the forest reserves are too large, and many gentlemen that think they ought not to have been established. But, gentlemen, the fact is that here is a little town trying to protect its water supply. They do not ask for a patent or a title to any part of the land; they only ask that it be covered into a forest reserve, so that adverse claimants may not take it up and then practice extortion against the town if it needs the land. I know the parliamentary situation is such in the House that gentlemen should not inject a big question like the forestry question into a little question like this, where a city needs water badly and wants to protect that water supply.

Mr. BOOHER. As I understand, it is said that this land is practically of no value.

Mr. FERRIS. Certainly; but at any time it might be taken up by a homesteader.

Mr. BOOHER. Why does not the community purchase it?

Mr. FERRIS. There is no law under which they can purchase it.

Mr. BOOHER. Why not amend the bill, then, so as to give them the right to purchase it?

Mr. FERRIS. I think that this is much preferable.

Mr. BOOHER. My idea is that the bill would better provide for a square donation of these lands than to put it in a forest reserve and then have to look after it for them.

Mr. FERRIS. I think the gentleman from Missouri knows that there would be a dozen objections to anything of that kind. The gentleman has the same interest in this I have. I have looked into it enough to know that this little town of 2,000 people ought to have this right granted to them.

Mr. BOOHER. Could not the bill be so worded that this little community would pay the extra expense of any forest rangers and clerks?

Mr. FERRIS. Clearly that would be impracticable, to say that we might have a dual administration in the forest reserve.

Mr. BOOHER. It would be easy enough to say that the community should contribute so much toward the care of it.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not know of a precedent for anything of that kind.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri that this is a matter affecting the public health. They are not able to buy this piece of land.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I have a certificate from the State sanitary inspector, who certifies over his signature the necessity of protecting the water supply of this village, and also a resolution of the city council and a resolution of the Gem of the Mountain Club, of Montpelier, urging this legislation, which I submit as part of my remarks:

DEPARTMENT OF FOOD, DRUG, AND HOTEL INSPECTION,
Boise, April 23, 1913.

To Senators W. E. Borah and James H. Brady and Representatives Burton L. French and Addison T. Smith, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: In the interests of public health and for the protection of the people of Montpelier in the use of the waters of Montpelier Creek for domestic purposes, I earnestly indorse the recommendations embodied in the attached resolution, adopted by the honorable mayor and city council of Montpelier April 16, 1913. I have made two official inspections of this water supply, the last inspection having been made April 15, 1913, and know that the relief they petition for is just and proper. With this protection the insanitary and dangerous conditions that now threaten the health of that community will be minimized.

Respectfully submitted.

JAMES H. WALLIS,
State Sanitary Inspector.

CITY OF MONTPELIER, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Montpelier, Idaho, April 26, 1913.

Hon. ADDISON T. SMITH, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SMITH: You will find inclosed herewith resolutions and recommendations pertaining to the Montpelier Creek watershed. Senator BORAH is familiar with the details of this matter, and I am writing him somewhat fully and inclosing a petition to our Senators and Representatives in this matter.

Mr. SMITH, this is a matter of very great importance to the people of our city, and we hope to have your best and immediate efforts in securing for us this relief. If the Senators and Representatives are fully advised of the situation, I don't think any of them will object to an immediate consideration of the bill for such purpose.

Yours, very truly,

A. B. GOUGH, Mayor.

Resolution.

Whereas a considerable portion of the Montpelier Creek watershed in Bear Lake County, Idaho, is now included in the Caribou National Forest Reserve, and it is practicable for that portion of said watershed not included therein to be attached thereto and made a part thereof; and

Whereas the lands of said watershed not now included in said reserve are not suitable for agricultural purposes, and are particularly described as follows, to wit: E. ½ sec. 23 and all of secs. 26 and 35, T. 11 S., R. 45 E., B. M.; also, secs. 1 and 2, E. ½ sec. 10, secs. 11 and 14, inclusive, E. ½ sec. 15, E. ½ sec. 22, secs. 23 to 26, inclusive, E. ½ of sec. 27, and secs. 31 to 36, inclusive, T. 12 S., R. 45 E., B. M.; also secs. 1 to 5, inclusive, N. ½ sec. 10, N. ½ sec. 11, and N. ½ of sec. 12, T. 13 S., R. 45 E., B. M.; and

Whereas large herds and bands of sheep, cattle, and other animals are herded, grazed, dipped, and bedded on that portion of said watershed not now included in said reserve, and many carcasses of dead animals are permitted to decay in said creek and on the above-described lands, and the waters of said creek are for said reason polluted and contaminated to such an extent as to render the use thereof for domestic purposes dangerous to human life; and

Whereas the city of Montpelier, Bear Lake County, Idaho, owns and operates a municipal waterworks system, and from which the inhabitants thereof are supplied with water for domestic use; and

Whereas said system is supplied with water from said creek, it being the only practical source of supply therefor; and

Whereas, by reason of the pollution and contamination of the water of said creek as aforesaid, the use thereof by the inhabitants of said city is a great menace to their health, and if the use thereof for domestic purposes is continued epidemics of typhoid and other diseases are likely to occur: Now, therefore, by reason of the foregoing facts, be it

Resolved by the mayor and council of the city of Montpelier, Bear Lake County, Idaho:

First. That our Senators and Representatives from Idaho in the United States Congress be, and are hereby, requested to use every possible effort to secure the immediate passage of a law through Congress attaching said above-described lands to and making them a part of the said Caribou National Forest Reserve, and that the honorable Secretaries of the Interior and Agriculture be requested to cooperate with our Senators and Representatives in this matter.

Second. That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to each of our Senators and Representatives from Idaho in Congress, and to the honorable Secretaries of the Interior and Agriculture.

STATE OF IDAHO,
County of Bear Lake, City of Montpelier, ss:

I, Thomas Barrett, clerk of the city of Montpelier, Bear Lake County, Idaho, hereby certify that the above and foregoing instrument is a true and correct copy of a resolution unanimously passed by the city council of the said city on the 16th day of April, 1913, and the whole thereof.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the official seal of said city this the 17th day of April, 1913.

Resolution.

Whereas the grazing of sheep and cattle in large numbers on the lands included within the Montpelier Creek watershed in Bear Lake County, Idaho, is a serious menace to the health of the inhabitants of the city of Montpelier, Idaho, nearly all of whom are supplied with water from said creek through the city water system; and

Whereas it is practicable for the lands included in said watershed to be attached to and made a part of the Caribou National Forest Reserve: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Gem of the Mountain Club of the city of Montpelier, Idaho, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Idaho be, and are hereby, requested to use their best efforts and influence to secure the immediate passage of a law through Congress placing the Montpelier Creek watershed in Bear Lake County, Idaho, in the Caribou National Forest Reserve; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress from Idaho at Washington, D. C.

The foregoing resolution was unanimously adopted at a meeting of the Gem of the Mountain Club, of Montpelier, Idaho, at a meeting thereof held on the 16th day of April, 1913.

Mrs. JOSEPH J. TAYLOR, President.
Mrs. E. A. PEASE, Secretary.

Mr. BOOHER. I have no doubt that it would be a nice thing for the village. It would appeal to me more strongly, knowing the forestry reservation and the administration of it, if we donated this land right square out.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. We do not want it in that way.

Mr. BOOHER. Certainly not; you do not want to take care of it. It is to get the Government to take care of it.

Mr. DIES. Why do they not want it?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It simply means the expense of taking care of it. There will be no expense incurred by the Government in taking care of it, but there would be if the town authorities had to police it.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, all sorts of insidious insinuations would be charged to these men if they wanted a grant of the land. Ordinarily when we come in here and ask for grants to land we are harpooned and assailed for asking to give people something, but when these gentlemen come in and ask modestly, not that it be given to them, but that the Government put it into the forest reserve and hold it there, then the gentleman says that we ought to pursue the other policy.

Mr. BOOHER. Does not the gentleman know that there was a deficit in the forest reservation last year of nearly $3,000,000?

Mr. FERRIS. I do.

Mr. BOOHER. Does not the gentleman know that it is growing larger every year?

Mr. FERRIS. Perhaps that is true.

Mr. BOOHER. And does not the gentleman know that the larger the reservation the greater the deficit will be every year?

Mr. FERRIS. Much of the gentleman's reasoning is very good, and I opened my remarks by saying that good men and great men and clear-headed men differ as to the method to be pursued in respect to forestry matters, but they should not inject a national question into the discussion of a little local community question like this.

Mr. BOOHER. But the gentleman ought not to get a local-community question in here when it involves a national question. I am not going to object to the bill, but I want to say now that next year you will find that you have had to employ, and your reports will show it, extra rangers and extra clerical force to look after this forest reservation to which you have added this grant.

Mr. FERRIS. They say not.

Mr. BOOHER. I just ask the gentleman to put a mark on that and see whether or not that is the result.

Mr. FERRIS. I agree there are too many jobs, as well as too many jobless; still this little water-supply bill is no place to fight out questions of that sort.

The forestry questions and the excess of employees in the Government would consume the time of an entire Congress and can not be settled here.

We can settle this little water-supply bill and not lose an acre of ground or cost an additional dollar, and we ought to do it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will ask the gentleman from Idaho whether he is willing to have this bill amended so as to strike out the school section.

Mr. FERRIS. I suggest that the gentleman strike it out.

Mr. MANN. I am not willing to consent that the General Government shall buy from the State of Idaho a school section in order to benefit one of her local communities. I suggest that the word "thirty-six," in line 10, on page 1, be changed to the word "thirty-five." Is the gentleman willing to accept that amendment? If so, I shall not object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. But "thirty-six" is not mentioned.

Mr. FRENCH. It is not described.

Mr. MANN. The difficulty with the gentleman is that they are not accurate about it.

Mr. FRENCH. The description has been checked over and verified by the department.

Mr. MANN. It says "sections 31 to 36, inclusive." Now, section 36 is a school section.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Then I suggest that we simply eliminate "thirty-six."

Mr. MANN. That is what I say—change "thirty-six" to "thirty-five."

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes. I do not think there will be any objection to that.

Mr. FRENCH. There would be no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 8, by striking out the word "east" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "west."

Amend, page 1, line 5, by striking out the word "base" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "Boise."

Amend, page 1, line 11, by striking out the word "base" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "Boise."

Amend, page 1, line 14, by striking out the word "base" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "Boise."

Amend, page 2, line 3, by striking out the period following the word "Reserve" and inserting a comma and adding the following words: "subject to all prior valid adverse rights."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, on page 1, line 10, by striking out the word "thirty-six" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "thirty-five."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Idaho, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting some papers which I have here.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ASSAY OFFICE, NEW YORK CITY.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13296) for the enlargement, etc., of the Wall Street front of the assay office in the city of New York.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made under the authority contained in the acts of Congress approved March 4, 1911, and August 26, 1912, for the enlargement, etc., of the Wall Street front of the assay office in New York City, and for vaults therefor, and architectural, engineering, and other technical services in connection therewith, are hereby reappropriated and made available for the erection of a new fireproof building on said Wall Street front, in continuation or extension of the present assay office building fronting on Pine Street, together with suitable vaults for use of said assay office and the adjoining Subtreasury, and, if necessary, an entrance from or connection with said Subtreasury for access therefrom, at a total limit of cost of not exceeding in the aggregate the present limits of cost for building, vaults, connection with the Subtreasury, and the architectural, engineering, or other technical services in connection therewith of $607,408.

SEC. 2. That the authority heretofore given to the Secretary of the Treasury, to employ, in his discretion, such architectural, engineering, or other technical services as he may deem necessary in connection with the enlargement, remodeling, or extension of the portion of the assay office in New York City fronting on Wall Street, and to pay for such services from the unexpended balance of the appropriation from which the rear portion of said assay office was constructed, is hereby continued with respect to said new building, payment therefor within the limit heretofore fixed to be made from the amounts herein reappropriated.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, further authorized to employ, in connection with the Supervising Architect's Office, and without regard to the civil-service laws, rules, or regulations for service, either within or without the District of Columbia, such other specially skilled technical, engineering, consulting, and superintending services as he may deem necessary, all such specially skilled technical, engineering, consulting, and superintending services to be exclusively employed in connection with the plans and specifications for said vaults and the foundations of said building and vaults. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to pay for such services mentioned in this paragraph such compensation and such actual necessary traveling and subsistence expenses in connection with such work as he may deem reasonable, from the amounts herein reappropriated, all such additional services and traveling expenses hereinbefore authorized to be in addition to and independent of the authorizations and appropriations for personal services and traveling expenses in said office otherwise made.

And in razing said Wall Street front the Secretary of the Treasury may dispose, by gift or otherwise, of the façade of said present building with a view to the preservation of said façade: Provided, That the United States shall not be put to any expense beyond that for said razing.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 10, strike out the words "reappropriated and" and insert the words "authorized to be."

Page 2, line 17, strike out the word "reappropriated" and insert the word "authorized."

Page 3, line 8, strike out the word "reappropriated" and insert the word "authorized."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CLARK of Florida, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

IMMIGRATION STATION AT BALTIMORE, MD.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11625) to increase the appropriation for the erection of an immigration station at Baltimore, Md.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 29 of the public building act approved March 4, 1913, providing for an immigration station at Baltimore, Md., is hereby amended so as to increase the limit of cost from $280,000 to $550,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, which I expect to do, this immigration station at Baltimore has given a good deal of discussion and this is the third time it has been on the floor. I think the first time it permitted an authorization, the next time an increase of the limit of cost, and another time again increasing the limit of cost, $270,000, and I think that Baltimore ought to get along with less expense, and I therefore object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects and the bill will be stricken from the calendar.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman whether he will not allow it to be passed without prejudice.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I see no good that will come in having this bill continue on the calendar when Members here believe that objection should be entered against it, and I think the bill ought to be disposed of, and I shall object.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin has already objected.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will reserve the right to object; I have no objection to the gentleman making a statement.

Mr. MANN. I would like to make a suggestion to the gentleman. This is the fourth public buildings bill we have had here. Now, we have just passed one a moment ago authorizing the expenditure of $600,000 for a purpose a little different from what it was originally appropriated for. Not a word was said, no objection was made, nobody took the floor. The gentleman who introduced the bill was absent. My distinguished friend from Maryland is present, and I suggest if he can get this restored to the calendar another time that he stay away, and probably the gentleman from Illinois, the gentleman from Connecticut, and the gentleman from Wisconsin will not object.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DONOVAN. To reserve the right to object, in order to correct the gentleman from Illinois. As a rule he is correct in his statements, but I do not like to see a gentleman at his time of life commit errors. [Laughter.] The bill which just passed did not appropriate a dollar——

Mr. MANN. Well, I did not say it did.

Mr. DONOVAN (continuing). But provided for an expenditure. If the gentleman wants to interrupt me, he must get permission of the Chair; he must obey the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman refuses to yield.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not refuse to yield, but the gentleman must get permission through the Chair. He must conform to parliamentary usage. [Laughter.] The bill provided for an unexpended-balance appropriation, no new appropriation; that is all. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I did not state that the bill just passed carried an appropriation. I stated it provided for a use of money in a different manner from the use provided for in the original appropriation. So I did not make a mistake in that respect. But the gentleman from Connecticut is right, I made an error in the statement I made a few moments ago when I said that no gentleman rose to object to the bill. The gentleman from Connecticut did rise, but was pulled down by his coat tails. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to withhold his objection for a moment.

Mr. STAFFORD. If it will accommodate my genial friend from Baltimore that this bill remain on the calendar two weeks and have some gentleman object to it again, I have no objection to having it passed over for two weeks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland that this bill go over without prejudice? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SHELBYVILLE (TENN.) POST OFFICE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13415) to increase the limit of cost of public building at Shelbyville, Tenn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the limit of cost of the United States postoffice building at Shelbyville, Tenn., be, and the same is hereby, increased $5,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if it is not considered improper I would like to ask the committee what was the authorization in the first place for this building? I see it is not stated in the report.

Mr. CANTRILL. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the original authorization was for $55,000.

Mr. MANN. And they want $5,000 additional?

Mr. CANTRILL. It is a very simple proposition. The Treasury Department finds the building can not be constructed for $55,000, and they want $5,000.

Mr. MANN. I would just like to inquire whether any member of the committee fell over in a faint when he received the modest request of an increase in cost from $55,000 to $60,000?

Mr. CANTRILL. I did not hear the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

YOSEMITE NATIONAL PARK PROTECTION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12533) to amend section 1 of an act of Congress approved April 9, 1912 (37 Stats., p. 80), entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to secure for the United States title to patented lands in the Yosemite National Park, and for other purposes."

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of an act of Congress approved April 9, 1912 (37 Stats., p. 80), entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to secure for the United States title to patented lands in the Yosemite National Park, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. That the Secretaries of the Departments of Interior and Agriculture, for the purpose of eliminating private holdings within the Yosemite National Park and to preserve intact timber along and adjoining the roads in the scenic portion of the park on patented lands, are hereby empowered, in their discretion, to obtain for the United States a complete title to any and all patented lands within the boundaries of said park by the exchange of timber or timber and lands within the Yosemite National Park and the Sierra and Stanislaus National Forests for timber on patented lands or for such lands and the timber thereon within the park."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I understand that there is a Senate bill——

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Now, Mr. Speaker, the same bill has passed the Senate with the committee amendment. The committee of the House unanimously requested that the chairman be authorized to call up the Senate bill (S. 4943) and it was laid on the desk for a week, and by some reason it went over to the committee. The papers are now on the Speaker's table, and if there is no objection I ask unanimous consent that the House bill be laid aside and the Senate bill be taken up in its place.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent that a Senate bill of like tenor be considered in place of the House bill.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman says that the Senate bill is on the Speaker's table. I do not know how it reached there. It can not be there theoretically, although it may be there practically.

The SPEAKER. It can not be there as a matter of rule, but it is here as a matter of fact.

Mr. MANN. That is all right.

Mr. RAKER. I saw the chairman of the committee, and saw the Speaker, and understood it could be done by unanimous consent. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman means to infer that it is in the House.

Mr. RAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. What is the request?

The SPEAKER. The request is to substitute the Senate bill for a House bill of a like tenor.

Mr. MANN. First get the committee discharged by unanimous consent.

Mr. RAKER. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Public Lands be discharged from further consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent that the Committee on the Public Lands be discharged from further consideration of the bill, and that the Senate bill of like tenor be submitted for the House bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. I think we should have the Senate bill read first. I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was going to do that. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 4943) to amend section 1 of an act of Congress approved April 9, 1912 (37 Stat., p. 80), entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to secure for the United States title to patented lands in the Yosemite National Park, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of an act of Congress approved April 9, 1912 (37 Stat., p. 80), entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to secure for the United States title to patented lands in the Yosemite National Park, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. That the Secretaries of the Departments of Interior and Agriculture, for the purpose of eliminating private holdings within the Yosemite National Park and to preserve intact timber along and adjoining the roads in the scenic portion of the park on patented lands, are hereby empowered, in their discretion, to obtain and accept for the United States a complete title to any and all patented lands within the boundaries of said park by the exchange of timber or timber and lands within the Yosemite National Park and the Sierra and Stanislaus National Forests for such lands and the timber thereon within the park, necessary conveyances of park and national forest timber or timber and lands to be made by said Secretaries, respectively. That the Secretaries of the said departments may, and are hereby authorized to, acquire title in fee by the exchange of lands of the United States for patented lands not exceeding 640 acres in the Sierra and Stanislaus National Forests, adjacent and contiguous to the Yosemite National Park, and when such patented lands are thus acquired said lands shall become a part of the Yosemite National Park and be subject to all the provisions of the act of October 1, 1890, entitled 'An act to set apart certain tracts of land in the State of California as forest reservations.'"

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAKER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the House bill will be tabled. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

The Clerk will report the next bill.

RELIEF OF HOMESTEADERS.

The next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 117) to amend the act of June 23, 1910, entitled "An act providing that entrymen for homesteads within the reclamation projects may assign their entries upon satisfactory proof of residence, improvement, and cultivation for five years, the same as though said entry had been made under the original homestead act."

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of June 23, 1910 (Public, 243; 36 Stats., p. 592), entitled "An act providing that entrymen for homesteads within reclamation projects may assign their entries upon satisfactory proof of residence, improvement, and cultivation for five years, the same as though said entry had been made under the original homestead act," is hereby amended by adding the following proviso:

"Provided, That any assignment made between June 23, 1910, and January 1, 1913, of which the assignor has submitted satisfactory final proof and the assignee purchased with the belief that the assignment was valid and under the act of June 23, 1910, are hereby confirmed, and the assignee shall be entitled to the land assigned as under the act of June 23, 1910, notwithstanding that said original entry was conformed to farm units and that the part assigned was canceled and eliminated from said entry prior to the date of assignment and prior to the date of final proof: Provided further, That such assignee shall in other respects comply with all of the provisions of the act of June 23, 1910."

Also the following committee amendment was read:

1. Strike out all of page 2 and substitute therefor the following:

"Provided, That any assignments made between June 23, 1910, and January 1, 1914, of all or portions of homestead entries upon which the assignors have submitted satisfactory final proof and the assignees purchased with the belief that the assignments were valid, are hereby confirmed, notwithstanding the original entries were conformed to farm units and the portions assigned canceled or eliminated from the entries prior to the dates of assignment or prior to submission of final proof: Provided further, That all entries so assigned shall be subject to the limitations, terms, and conditions of the reclamation act and acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, and all of said assignees whose entries are hereby confirmed shall, as a condition to receiving patent, make the proof heretofore required of assignees: And provided further, That this act shall not apply to any lands canceled and eliminated from any such entry and which have been embraced in any valid settlement or homestead entry of another."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, when this bill was under consideration some weeks ago I asked the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] if he knew where these tracts were located that it is proposed to validate. At that time the gentleman was not informed. Has he that information now?

Mr. RAKER. Well, I have some of it. I have a letter here from the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Jones, and I will read it for the benefit of the House. It is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 30, 1914.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. RAKER: I am in receipt of your letter of March 17, 1914, transmitting a copy of bill H. R. 117 and a report thereon from the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, and requesting a list of the parties affected by this bill, for the use of the committee when the matter comes up again on the calendar, March 30, 1914.

In reply, I have to advise you that the Commissioner of the General Land Office reports that he does not have a list of the parties affected by the proposed legislation, in as much as assignments of reclamation homestead entries are not kept separately in his office, and that to furnish you the list requested it would be necessary to withdraw from the files of his office all of the reclamation homestead entries for projects upon which farm units have been established and examine each case individually, to ascertain whether or not it was affected by the proposed legislation. To accomplish this would require the services of three or four clerks for probably two months. The commissioner reports that the number of entries affected by this legislation is small. Regardless of the condition above described, the commissioner will procure the desired data if you consider it necessary.

Respectfully,

A. A. JONES,
First Assistant Secretary.

In response to that I advised the Secretary that I felt that the House with that letter presented would not require three or four clerks working to present all of the entries involved in this bill when, as a matter of fact, there appeared to be but a few. There are several cases, and one in particular, the case of O. P. McCartney, Montrose, 01068, in which the facts are as follows: McCartney made proof August 23, 1911. His land has been conformed. On May 8, 1910, he was allowed to assign the canceled portion. That is just what we are trying——

Mr. MONDELL. He was allowed what?

Mr. RAKER. He was allowed to assign the canceled portion, as I stated before; and I have gone over it fully this time. The final proof in this case was made upon the whole tract, but before the final proof was made or assignment made, which, of course, could not be under any circumstances until after final proof, the Secretary of the Interior required a conformation—that is, to conform to the farm unit. Now, again in the case of John Mohrherr, the entryman submitted final proof on July 22, 1911. His land had been conformed March 23, 1910. His assignment of the canceled entry was rejected. Since the department itself did not construe the act similarly in various cases, it is not to be wondered that individuals throughout the country, believing the act would have a broad construction, made assignments of canceled portions of entries. One example can be given in the case of John Mohrherr, who assigned a portion of his entry to Lucy E. Komall. I suppose the gentleman is familiar with it. Lucy E. Komall purchased from John Mohrherr, who made final proof and assigned a part of his entry that he could not hold, because it did not conform to the farm unit. In other words, another 80-acre tract, the canceled portion of his homestead entry at Glasgow, 03734. This was purchased by Lucy E. Komall in entire good faith for the sum of $2,500. Seven hundred dollars of this she borrowed from the bank at Fairview, Mont., which bank passed upon the loan and approved it.

The $1,800 represented her total wealth, the earnings of a lifetime. She has three children, all under the age of 6 years, and absolutely no resources but the earnings from the land to support herself and her children. Now, that is one case, and the department is holding that up now. Relief should be granted. I will state the situation as to "first" and "second" form withdrawals as it applies to cases involved under this bill and then a case or so showing the operation of this bill for relief upon such cases. There is no disposition to criticize the department in any way. They held as they believed the law to be. But where parties acted in good faith and purchased the tract eliminated by reason of the entryman conforming to the farm unit the purchaser from such entryman should not suffer if the transaction was founded in good faith and paid value.

A first-form reclamation withdrawal is a withdrawal on the part of the executive authority of the Government of land absolutely from all forms of appropriation, and it has been held by the courts that this sort of a withdrawal cuts off even the settlement of an occupant upon the public domain. (U. S. v. Hanson, 167 Fed., 881.) In other words, the appropriation by the withdrawal is for use by the Government and not for the use by individuals. It is upon the first-form withdrawal that the United States erects the permanent reclamation improvements.

The second form of withdrawal is a withdrawal of the land from any form of disposition under the public-land laws except under the reclamation act; that is, under the homestead act as it applies to reclamation projects. At the present time, until the land is ready for irrigation, persons are not allowed to file applications and make entries.

Consequently, we have the situation that there are numbers of projects in which the entrymen were upon the lands for years at a time without the Government's delivering water to the land, and Congress was compelled to pass for the relief of these persons the act of June 23, 1910 (36 Stat., 835), in the future withholding from entry lands within a project until public notice of water being supplied to the lands. And, further, by the same act Congress excused entrymen from residence upon such lands until the date of the public notice. (Roberts v. Spencer, 40 L. D., 306.)

THE ACT OF JUNE 23, 1910.

The reason why the act of June 23, 1910, was passed, according to the recollection of Mr. MONDELL, is stated in the debate of March 16, 1914, RECORD, page 5250. The manner in which it worked out was that persons were upon land for several years prior to the public notice, and often were allowed to make proof of residence and improvements. The proof of cultivation and reclamation was made later when the water was delivered; but a person was not required, after living upon the land for five years, to continue to live until the water was delivered after having made the five-year proof. It was therefore clear that after a person had made five-year proof prior to public notice that he would often be cut down and would lose the land upon which he had made improvements.

In the case of Henry D. Holbrook, Montrose, Colo, No. 01325, the principal improvements of Mr. Holbrook were upon the land eliminated from his entry. The object of the act of June 23, 1910, was immediately the relief of settlers and homesteaders who had come upon the land, lived upon it for five years, and had improved the same, but were brought face to face with the order of the department upon public notice to cut down the land upon which they had made a proof. When a man has made final proof, provided everything is regular, he has the right to assign. Therefore all the act of June 23, 1910, does is to make an assignment valid which might by a subsequent act of the department in conforming the land make the assignment invalid. After the passage of the act of June 23, 1910, in many instances confirmation was made prior to the issuing of public notice. This differed from the published and announced practice.

A single instance of this is in the case of the Uncompahgre project, as shown in the case of Henry Holorook, Montrose, Colo., 01325, where Holbrook's entry was conformed to 40 acres prior to the issuance of public notice and in advance of distributing water to his lands.

The act of June 23, 1910, was administered unevenly, in the opinion of many, for in the case of O. P. McCartney, Montrose, 01068, the facts are as follows:

McCartney made proof August 23, 1911. His land had been conformed May 18, 1910. He was allowed to assign the canceled portion.

In the case of John Mohrherr, the entryman submitted final proof July 22, 1911. His land had been conformed March 23, 1910. His assignment of the canceled portion was rejected.

Since the department itself did not construe the act similarly in various cases, it is not to be wondered at that individuals throughout the country, believing the act would have a broad construction, made assignments of canceled portions of entries.

The decision of the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior, Adams, in the case of Lucy E. Komoll, decided against the right of assignment although the facts were fully in the record at the time, and in the case of O. P. McCartney, Montrose, 01068, the First Assistant Secretary having none of the same circumstances before him decided in favor of the right of assignment. The equities in the case of Lucy E. Komoll were overwhelmingly in her favor as compared to the equities in the case of O. P. McCartney.

OTHERWISE ASSIGNABLE.

The meaning of the letter of the Secretary is clear, although the language might be improved; that is, that various persons made homestead entries within reclamation projects and made final proofs, but prior thereto their areas had been cut down, but notwithstanding the fact that the cases were not strictly within the act of June 23, 1910, it was believed that an assignment could be made such as is well illustrated in the case of Lucy E. Komoll where she not only purchased in good faith, putting all of her money into the purchase, but the local bank composed of shrewd business men believed that the only risk was an ordinary credit risk, and that the assignment gave Lucy E. Komoll the right to the land. The law is not intended to benefit anyone who assigned prior to the making of proof. It is an amendment of the act of June 23, 1910, but does not change the act in that respect. It is only to remedy the cases where an entryman having made final proof assigns a portion of the land originally within his entry, but which has been conformed prior to the making of his proof, and also only in cases where the purchaser bought believing in good faith that the assignment was within the act of June 23, 1910.

The act is for the relief of purchasers and not of entrymen.

Mr. MONDELL. As near as I am able to judge from the reading of those letters and the rather incomplete statement of the case, they are cases where the department has held that though an entryman had made final proof as contemplated by the act of June 23, 1910, that inasmuch as the party had been called upon to conform prior to that time, the department holds, as I understand it, that the entryman is not entitled to the benefits of that act.

Now, if the gentleman's idea and the thought of the committee was to remedy that condition of affairs, it is simply remedying a condition of affairs that arises out of an erroneous construction of the law by the department, as I understand it, and there could be no possible objection to it. This proposition, however, comes as near to being a proposition to compound a felony as we are ever likely to find in a proposition for legislation.

Mr. RAKER. Let me answer the gentleman. The original bill was drawn by the department, and the department drew that substitute, with one slight difference of wording.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the department officials are mortals, like everybody else, and they are likely to fall into error, as we all are, and others may understand these matters as well as the man who drew the bill. Without regard to what the intent of the committee was, and without regard to what the intention of the department was—and the intentions of both parties, I am sure, were proper, sound, and reasonable—the act itself, I repeat, would allow the confirmation of what comes pretty near being a felony.

The gentleman said a moment ago that of course no one could assign until after he had made final proof. The gentleman has not read the bill.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, yes; I have read the bill. I have gone over it and given it lots of consideration, and I say again emphatically, if there is any objection on the other ground I can not help it, because no man can make an assignment nor can the assignee obtain any right until after the final proof has been made.

Mr. MONDELL. He can not under the law.

Mr. RAKER. And he can not under this bill.

Mr. MONDELL. What, then, do the words in the act mean which I will read for the gentleman's benefit, after reading the proviso——

Mr. RAKER. On what line?

Mr. MONDELL. On page 2. It is not necessary to read anything else until we reach the words on line 25—

Are hereby confirmed—

That is the confirmation—

notwithstanding the original entries were conformed to farm units and the portions assigned canceled or eliminated from the entries prior to the dates of assignment and prior to submission of final proof.

What does the gentleman understand that to mean? If the intent of the committee is——

Mr. RAKER. Let me say this to the gentleman: There is no use in taking the time of the committee in words. If the gentleman thinks that the language on line 3 of page 3—"or prior to submission of final proof"—means what he contends, I am more than willing to strike them out, if the gentleman thinks there will be any objection. I am more than willing to do that, and I will ask to amend the bill by striking it out.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, that is not the only objection. Another objection is that this bill confirms entries where the parts assigned were actually eliminated from the entry before assignment and before the submission of final proof. In other words, this is what might occur under this law: That at a given date the department ordered an entry to be reduced and made to conform to the farm unit. Thereupon, that was accomplished, perhaps, by a relinquishment on the part of the entryman to all claim to the excess. At any rate, it was accomplished, and it ceased to be a part of the entry. It was no more the land of that entryman than it was the land of my friend from California; but notwithstanding the fact that those lands had been eliminated from his entry and ceased to be a part of his entry, he proceeded to assign these lands to other parties.

Now, he had no right to do that. He had no claim whatever to that land. It was not his. He was assigning something that did not belong to him. While I have no doubt but that there are some cases that ought to be relieved—the class of cases that the gentleman refers to seems to me, under a proper interpretation of the law of 1910, to come under it, but if the department is holding——

Mr. RAKER. No; the ruling is the other way.

Mr. MONDELL. If the department is simply holding that these assignments can not be made because they had ordered the conformation prior to a certain time, although the party did go in good faith and make the final proof covering the entire area, then the gentleman ought to draw a bill in different form from the bill before us, because certainly this bill will validate cases that ought not to be allowed. It will validate cases where the entryman had given up all notion that he had any claim to the excess land. Later, after the entry has been confirmed, he concludes to assign those lands to some one else, either before or after he has presented final proof. And here is the curious part of this whole proposition. It is not illuminated by the report. It is not illuminated by the letter of the department. How could an entryman have submitted approved, satisfactory proof on the entire entry when a part of the entry prior to that time on the records of the Land Office had been eliminated and separated from the entry and restored to the public domain?

Mr. RAKER. There is the crux of the whole thing, and the gentleman from Wyoming will not permit his mind to receive the facts as they actually exist and as this bill applies. I hope he will listen to me for just a moment, because I do not want to take up much time.

This bill does not affect the entryman, and the gentleman ought not to insist on that before the House. It affects the assignee, the bona fide party who has obtained this land, that has been relieved by virtue of an order—the man who has expended his money and made improvements upon the land. The original entryman can snap his fingers and say it makes no difference to him what becomes of the man who purchased from him.

Now, let me call the gentleman's attention to this fact: When the party is ordered to conform to the homestead unit of that project he does not do it all at once. Many of them have done so. Possibly some did not. Some did not do it and made final proof. Such a man did not relinquish his entry. The order was made for him to conform. He went and made final proof, and it may be he had the right to do it; but whether he did or not, the record does not show anything against him. He makes his final proof. It is accepted for the 80 acres or for the whole 160 acres. He then sells to an innocent party, who believes he has an absolute right to obtain that assignment and then go upon the land and improve it, obtain the water right, cultivate it, and then eventually get a patent by conforming to the act of June 23, 1910. Now, clearly that innocent party ought to be given relief.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman insists on stating a case which, while it might come within the provisions of this statute under the interpretations of the department, really and in fact comes under the provisions of the act of June 23, 1910, without any remedial legislation.

Mr. RAKER. The department holds that it does not. That is the difference.

Mr. MONDELL. The difficulty with the gentleman's legislation is that it includes classes of cases in which parties who have ceased to have any right, title, or interest in lands have sold them.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no; it does not affect the original party at all. I have said that repeatedly, and I trust the gentleman will not confuse the issue by claiming that the original homesteader is affected by this bill. Far from it. It is the assignee. It is the one in possession. It is the one who paid his money for the land. It is the one living upon the land and improving it to-day, and applying for the water right, and complying with the law, and trying to build up a home; and it does not apply to the original entryman in any way, shape, or form.

Mr. MONDELL. If all the gentleman wants to do is to establish some sort of a homestead right on the part of these people who have been foolish enough to buy something from individuals that those individuals did not own, then entirely different legislation from that before the House ought to be brought here for our consideration.

Mr. RAKER. I think that if——

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman has a good case where innocent parties have been unfortunately imposed upon, and if he wants to relieve those people to a certain extent, that can be accomplished, because these parties are in possession of these lands in any event. All in the world they have to do now is to continue to live upon them and cultivate them and pay for them. What the bill proposes to do is to validate and confirm a certain transaction which was not only contrary to law, but contrary to good morals.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, nonsense. That is improperly stating the case.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, well, it is easy enough for the gentleman to say that.

Mr. RAKER. It is. The department has gone over this bill, it has made its report upon it, and the gentleman's theory and argument do not apply to the case at all.

Here is an innocent party who has gone on the land, purchased it, lived there, and the gentleman from Wyoming knows and knows well, because he has been on the Public Lands Committee and the Committee on Irrigation, that this party is in possession by virtue of a transfer, and if he loses that right he may not have a right to file on the land again. He may be disqualified to file on a homestead. Now, when they have spent $2,500 on these lands that they believed to be valid, which appeared to them to be valid and which the department in a different way held to be valid, why should not the parties be given relief?

Mr. MONDELL. We had a case here the other day in a bill introduced by me of a somewhat similar character in regard to a homestead entry. A party had purchased a tract that had been covered by a homestead entry. He discovered that the proof was contested by the Government and the tract was held for cancellation. All we attempted to do was to give the party who lived upon the land the right to make a homestead entry. There would be no objection to giving these people the right to make homestead entries if any are not qualified homesteaders. Here are outside parties, speculators to a certain extent, parties who do not want to live on the land. If they do want to live on the land we ought to give them the opportunity to do so and get title. The difficulty with the bill is that it puts the stamp of approval on transactions which are fraudulent.

Mr. RAKER. That is absolute nonsense.

Mr. MONDELL. It is putting the stamp of approval on acts that involve moral turpitude.

Mr. RAKER. The department in the first case that I have referred to granted the right to obtain a patent.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, if they think that is the right thing to do, let them do it.

Mr. RAKER. The party I referred to here is a woman and not qualified as a homestead entryman. She may have a husband who is away and who will not come back. It may be he is worthless. You would be willing to beat her out of a homestead, her money and her home, where she is trying to protect her children; you would deprive her of that by some little legal technicality. I know the gentleman does not mean that.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, the gentleman can not make that kind of an appeal to a Representative from a woman-suffrage State [laughter] on the theory that I am to be led away from the main proposition by a hypothetical case. If there is a woman in the case and her condition is as the gentleman suggests, she can make a homestead settlement.

Mr. RAKER. Not with her husband living.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Unless he absolutely abandons her she can not make a homestead entry.

Mr. MONDELL. Any woman whose husband has abandoned her and is not caring for her can make a homestead entry. A woman who is in such an unfortunate condition—or fortunate condition perhaps, because a man that will leave a woman under those circumstances is not worthy of her, and she is lucky to have him go—can make a homestead entry.

We have been legislating on public lands a good many years, and some gentlemen have thought that I was liberal in my views in regard to public lands, but I never knowingly have approved a bill that provided for the confirmation of an illegal act. I do not believe that we ought to begin to do it now.

Mr. RAKER. There is no provision in the bill for that, and it is a thousand miles from it.

Mr. FOSTER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to inquire if the gentleman from Wyoming and the gentleman from California are getting any nearer an agreement. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from California is not enlightening me in this matter sufficiently to remove my doubts in regard to what the bill proposes to do, or will allow to be done at least. I am quite sure that the bill provides for the validation of certain transactions that were illegal, and it ought not to be done.

Mr. RAKER. I want to ask the gentleman from Wyoming if he was not a member of the committee that reported the act of June 23, 1910? He certainly was, and every one of those confirmations were against existing law. The gentleman from Wyoming has passed on a desert act in the Committee on Public Lands where the party who entered knew that he violated the law and could not prove up his claim. I remember one from the gentleman's State where the department said that it reeked with fraud.

Mr. MONDELL. What case does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. RAKER. We passed it last year. I will get it and call it to the gentleman's attention. It was a case where a man had a mineral entry and it was a violation of law. The gentleman showed that he had expended his money, and said that he ought to be given the money because he ought not to be punished for what the entryman had done before him. Here is a case where innocent parties to a transfer ought not to be punished any more than the man in Wyoming who had purchased from somebody else who had made the entry and violated the law.

Mr. MONDELL. Perhaps the gentleman refers to the Mathene case, which I have already referred to. All we did there was to give him the right of homestead. I have no objection to allowing anyone who has lived in good faith upon a piece of reclamation land the right to homestead it.

Mr. RAKER. That is what they are doing in this case. They have paid their money and got their homes.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, not at all. You do not require compliance with the homestead law with regard to residence.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, yes; we do.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, no; the gentleman knows better than that.

Mr. RAKER. Residence has been complied with.

Mr. MONDELL. Residence would have been complied with, providing the other party had complied with it, providing the other party had complied with the law, and had retained his right to the land up to the time he made proof and made his assignment.

Mr. RAKER. Let me call the gentleman's attention to this fact, that the law requires, if this bill passes, that there must be cultivation, there must be improvement, there must be a water right obtained and full value paid for it. Now, because the original party made a mistake when he made this final proof and sold to the innocent third party, that third party ought not to be punished, but ought to be given the right to obtain patent if he complies with all of the law.

Mr. MONDELL. He did more than make a mistake. He committed a fraud. He might have been prosecuted and sent to jail for it.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no; the act of June 23, 1910, relieved those people who had been doing the same thing, who were honestly in good faith.

Mr. MONDELL. But the act of June 23, 1910, is not retroactive. It applies to the future.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman from Wyoming going to object?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SECOND HOMESTEAD AND DESERT-LAND ENTRIES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 1657) to authorize the allowance of second homestead and desert-land entries.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That where any person otherwise duly qualified to make entry of public lands under the homestead or desert-land laws has heretofore made or may hereafter make entry under said laws, and has forfeited or abandoned the same, such person may be permitted to make another entry upon showing to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that the prior entry was made in good faith, was forfeited or abandoned because of matters beyond his control, and that he has not speculated in his right nor otherwise committed a fraud or attempted fraud in connection with such prior entry—

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That any person, otherwise duly qualified to make entry of public lands under the homestead or desert-land laws, who has heretofore made or may hereafter make entry under said laws, and who, through no fault of his own, may have lost, forfeited, or abandoned the same, or who may hereafter lose, forfeit, or abandon same, shall be entitled to the benefits of the homestead or desert-land laws as though such former entry had never been made: Provided, That such applicant shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that the prior entry or entries were made in good faith, were lost, forfeited, or abandoned because of matters beyond his control, and that he has not speculated in his right nor committed a fraud or attempted fraud in connection with such prior entry or entries, and that he has not relinquished his former entry or entries for a valuable consideration in excess of his filing fees."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] if he thinks many homestead entrymen would be able to make a second entry under the provisions of a statute that would require that he shall prove that his first entry was lost, forfeited, or abandoned because of matters beyond his control?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Is that the end of the question?

Mr. MONDELL. That is one of the questions.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman that as the report shows in this case there are six or eight bills pending now before Congress providing for second homestead desert-land entries, one introduced by the gentleman himself, one by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RAKER], one by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH], besides one by myself, and one by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and another by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. This bill was taken up before the Public Lands Committee, together with all of the other bills that I have mentioned, and all of them were referred to the Department of the Interior. We obtained reports upon them, and then made the best composite bill that we could get out of the committee. I think the bill is a good bill, except the last clause that is contained in the last line and a half. I do not like that. At the same time, it was put in there by Mr. LENROOT, and the committee accepted it.

Mr. MONDELL. The last line and a half is similar to the law now on the statute books.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I understand.

Mr. MONDELL. And there is no special objection to it, but the difficulty with the legislation is this, that it holds out a hope that never can be realized. I can not think of any condition of affairs that will arise in connection with a homestead entry or in connection with many homestead entries where the loss or forfeiture or abandonment is due to matters beyond the control of the entryman.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, yes; there are a great many.

Mr. MONDELL. There might be.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There is sickness and all sorts of failure of crops, and everything of that kind, that the entryman has nothing to do with, that are beyond his control.

Mr. MONDELL. Those things make it difficult for the entryman, but they are not beyond his control.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Drought is beyond his control, and the death of his wife and children and a great many other things are beyond his control. They do not affect his good faith. I may say that the committee, since the gentleman ceased being a member of it, has given this matter a great deal of study. The department is desirous of having a general law that will apply to the future as well as to the past. The numerous bills which the gentleman and I have helped to pass have been to correct conditions as they went along, to take up a few years at a time. Now, the department felt they ought to have a bill to cover the future as well as past entries, and this is as favorable, under existing conditions, as we could all agree to. It is very drastic, I admit, but it is better than nothing; it is better than the present law. We felt, and I feel, that if you will permit the consideration of this measure, considering the rulings which they are now making upon those few people who are trying to get a second entry when they have lost one through casualties and hardships and misfortunes entirely beyond their control and when they are in the utmost good faith, we feel you ought not to prevent the enactment of this measure.

Mr. MONDELL. We have on the statute books to-day a law allowing those, who, prior to February 3, 1911, through any cause, lost, forfeited, or abandoned their homestead entries, to make another entry and all they are required to do is to furnish description of the former entry and to prove that it was not relinquished for a valuable consideration, and so forth.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, that statute is useful and helpful but——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The way it is construed now it is not very useful.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, if they can construe a statute of that kind so that it is not helpful what benefit can there be from a statute which says first that the entryman must prove that the entry was lost or abandoned through no fault of his own.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. They do hold it.

Mr. MONDELL. Second, he must prove it occurred because of matters beyond the entryman's control. Further than that, I am very much opposed to the department's idea of making this a law for the future as well as for the past. In my opinion that would be a very great mistake. It is said that as we pass from time to time laws allowing those who prior to the passage of these acts have lost or abandoned their entries to make new entries, that we should provide a permanent statute under which entrymen may make a second entry. I do not know but what he could make a third or a fourth under this law, providing he will prove certain things. Now, that is, in my opinion, very objectionable. The right to make homestead entries might become a matter of barter and trade——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There are not so many of them.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the gentleman says no; that is his opinion. It is one thing to say that those who have heretofore lost or abandoned their homesteads and have been guilty of no fraud—have received nothing for the relinquishment—may make another entry, but quite another thing to say that for the future anyone can go upon a homestead entry with the understanding that the entry can be abandoned and another entry taken. We ought not hold out any such hope as that to a homestead entryman, particularly if we do not in fact really provide reasonably for the second entry.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman will pardon me. If he goes on he has got to lose it by matters beyond his control. Goodness alive, he has to bring himself within this very drastic law before he can get in again.

Mr. MONDELL. There are two objections to the bill. In the first place, it lays down a new theory in regard to a homestead, that a man may hope and expect when he makes an entry to have another under certain conditions.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. He gets no benefit out of that.

Mr. MONDELL. And, second, it denies that hope and expectation to him when he attempts to realize upon it. You lay down conditions so difficult that there will not be one entryman out of a hundred who can by any possibility come within them. Where an entryman lost a homestead or abandoned a homestead or failed to make proof upon a homestead there is not one case out of ten where he could prove to the satisfaction of an exacting department that it occurred through no fault of his own, that it was due to matters beyond his control.

Why, the department may say, and still be within the law, that though a man may have had sickness in his family he still could have held his homestead if he desired to do it. Even though death had occurred in his family he still could have held his homestead if he desired to do it, the Land Office might hold; even though he may have failed to raise crops, he might still have adhered to his land, remained upon it, and held it if he had desired to do it, would be the holding under this bill. Few of these things for which men abandon homesteads are matters entirely beyond their control so far as the act of abandonment is concerned, because it is optional with a man so long as he is alive and able to get about at all to stay upon a tract of land. You may say that would not be a fair interpretation, but it would be the interpretation followed, I fear. If you are going to give the right of second entry, give it under conditions that will be of some value after you have done it. And while I regret very much to oppose a law that presumes or pretends to give a right of second entry, I do not think I would be justified in approving the passage of an act which, as a matter of fact, would help very few, if any. It would simply hold out a hope to many entrymen that never could be realized.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion? Let me suggest to the gentleman from Wyoming that if anybody goes out on a piece of land with the expectation of losing his first chance to a homestead and with the hope of getting another one under this law he must have knowledge of the conditions under which he has got to get it, has he not?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. And he must have knowledge that it would be almost an utter impossibility for him to get a second one, if the gentleman is correct.

Mr. MONDELL. The only man under such a law as this that would have that hope before him would be a man with a sufficiently easy conscience that he would not hesitate to make any kind of an affidavit as to conditions under which he abandoned. It would not help the honest homestead settler at all.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me suggest, if you will wait a moment, that I can not conceive of why a man would want to take a first homestead and then be compelled to show that he got no benefit out of it whatever. Why would he take the first when he could not get any benefit out of it? He must simply lose it all in order to take the second one.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is familiar with the customs in the western country.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It is entirely reasonable.

Mr. MONDELL. Assuming that there is any possibility of getting a second entry under this law, and you must assume that, or there is no reason for passing the law——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Why would he get it, then?

Mr. MONDELL. Wait a moment. The gentleman well knows there are reasons why men might be inclined to make a homestead entry to temporarily hold a piece of land for some one else or for some purpose other than the purpose of making a home upon it, with the idea of later reliquishing it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Is not that a very remote contingency?

Mr. MONDELL. I think it would be entirely remote if the man had read this law, but if he simply had understood that there was a law under which he could make a second entry if he had not received any consideration for his first, then I can understand how many men might do that very thing. But the trouble is that the honest entryman who really was compelled to abandon would not, I fear, get any benefit under this statute.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. NORTON. In that case the entry would have been made in good faith, and under this provision he would be entitled to a second entry, of course.

Mr. MONDELL. It is necessary for him to prove it is in good faith; that he lost or abandoned it through no fault of his own; that it was due to matters entirely beyond his control. When you came to the issue comparatively few people, if any, would secure the benefit of the act. And that is the objection to it. First, it holds out a hope to a homestead entryman that he can make a second entry. He should go on his entry charged with the fact that he must examine it carefully and conclude that it is a tract of land that he can live upon.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We try to.

Mr. MONDELL. As matters now stand when persons make a homestead entry they do it with the thought that one homesteady entry exhausts their right. One result of that is that you do not have these speculative entries that you would have if there was some hope held out that a second entry could be made, whether or no.

As a matter of fact, however, you have made the bill so drastic that few, if any, could make a second entry, whether honest or dishonest. You hold out a hope that should not be held out to the entryman when he goes upon the land. Then the honest entryman who, by reason of crop failure and sickness or other matters, is compelled to leave his land would secure no benefit, because the department under it would, without violating its spirit, lay down a set of rules under which it would be practically impossible for anyone to make a second entry.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman is talking about a homestead all the time. This bill applies to desert lands as well as homesteads. Does the gentleman think a man would pay $1.25 an acre on a desert entry and go to work upon it simply with the intention to lose it?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman knows that some men have done that.

Mr. MANN. Would not a man who took up a claim have a greater chance of quitting if he knew he had a second chance held out to him?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. He has got to do a dollar's worth of work on an acre each year. He has got to make that expenditure. I do not see why you would deliberately wish to throw that away.

Mr. MANN. If a man became somewhat discouraged, as often happens, would he not be more likely to abandon his desert or homestead claim if he knew he had the right to renew it somewhere else? In other words, is it not somewhat like marriage and divorce, where a man and woman agree to live together during the lives of both? Suppose you had under the law provided, however, that whenever either one made an affidavit that he or she was tired of the other they could take a new husband or wife?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. They would have to do more than merely make an affidavit. I can not conceive of a case where people would deliberately go and abandon the results of all their work and have to make as drastic a showing as the gentleman complains of. It is true it is a very drastic showing, in order to get effective results; but the committee thought this would reach a good many cases which the present law does not reach, especially applying to the desert lands, where it would help in building up the West.

Mr. MONDELL. The law now on the statute books embraces both the homestead and desert entries.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from North Dakota?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. I am very anxious to see enacted into law a second homestead act, but I must confess that this does not nearly conform to my idea of what the law should be. I will ask the gentleman from Colorado if he will not agree to an amendment here by striking out the words in lines 12 and 13, as follows:

> Were lost, forfeited, or abandoned because of matters beyond his control—

So that it would read:

> Provided, That such applicant shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that the prior entry or entries were made in good faith, and that he has not speculated in his right nor committed a fraud or attempted fraud in connection with his prior entry.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Well, I will say that I would like to see the law made more liberal than this. I do not think these drastic provisions are necessary, but the committee thought so, and the department seems to think so. The Senate bills that are coming over from the Senate are much more liberal than this, but I do not believe they can be passed. In my judgment this law was better than nothing. That is all there is to it. I do not like it any more than the gentleman does, but I think it is an improvement over the present drastic law.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be allowed to retain its place upon the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I do not think this debate ought to be allowed to go on any further. There are 40 or 50 other bills requiring consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. MANN. I asked for the regular order, Mr. Speaker. I do not like to cut off my friend from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The SPEAKER. But that does cut off the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Does the gentleman want to move an amendment to the bill?

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman asks that it be passed over.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Colorado desire that the bill be passed over?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] offer his amendment. I ask that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary to consider it in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reserves the right to object to what?

Mr. MONDELL. I reserve the right to object to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair put that question three times. That is the Chair's recollection.

Mr. MONDELL. Why, I could not reserve the right to object until the Chair asked if anyone did object.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I suggest to the gentleman from Wyoming that he offer the amendments he desires to offer, and let us go ahead.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PAYNE. Is there any provision in the rule which permits gentlemen to reserve the right to object, and then go on and make long speeches every time?

The SPEAKER. There is not. The House has just drifted into the practice.

Mr. MONDELL. If certain amendments were adopted, I should not object; but the gentleman has not shown any disposition to accept those amendments.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Those amendments are not going to be accepted unless we have a quorum here. This bill has been gone over very carefully by the Committee on the Public Lands, and we do not propose to extend the provision with reference to second homestead entries any further, and the gentleman ought not to ask it.

Mr. MONDELL. The committee has gone too far.

The SPEAKER. This bill is up for consideration. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

Mr. MANN. Not yet, Mr. Speaker. It is a Union Calendar bill, is it not?

The SPEAKER. No; it is not a Union Calendar bill. It is on the House Calendar, although the Chair is rather of the opinion that it ought to be on the Union Calendar, if anybody had raised the point.

Mr. MANN. I shall have to make the point of order——

Mr. FOSTER. It is too late to make the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. I had reserved the right to object, and I understood I had that right.

The SPEAKER. This is the situation about that: After this debate had been running for something like an hour, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] demanded the regular order. The regular order was to put the question whether there was objection or not, and the Chair put it three different times, and there was no objection at any time.

Mr. MONDELL. I reserved the right to object.

The SPEAKER. There must be an end to all things some time.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] asked that the bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. That request was not submitted to the House.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I did feel that we ought to bring it to a close in some way pretty soon.

Mr. MONDELL. I think I still have the right to object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The right to object to what? The Chair can not understand what it is that the gentleman is objecting to.

Mr. MONDELL. To the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair put that question three times.

Mr. MURDOCK. And the gentleman did not object.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the Chair hold that it is too late to object?

The SPEAKER. Certainly, the Chair holds it is too late. When the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] demanded the regular order, it was the business of the Chair to put the question whether or not there was objection, and the Chair put it, and nobody objected; and thinking perhaps the gentleman from Wyoming did not hear it, the Chair put it again, and there was confusion, and he put it the third time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Go ahead and offer your amendments.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That any person otherwise duly qualified to make entry of public lands under the homestead or desert-land laws, who has heretofore made or may hereafter make entry under said laws, and who, through no fault of his own, may have lost, forfeited, or abandoned the same, or who may hereafter lose, forfeit, or abandon same, shall be entitled to the benefits of the homestead or desert-land laws as though such former entry had never been made: Provided, That such applicant shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that the prior entry or entries were made in good faith, were lost, forfeited, or abandoned because of matters beyond his control, and that he has not speculated in his right nor committed a fraud or attempted fraud in connection with such prior entry or entries, and that he has not relinquished his former entry or entries for a valuable consideration in excess of his filing fees."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The affirmative vote was taken.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MONDELL. I desire to amend the amendment on page 2 by striking out, in line 5, the words "or may hereafter make."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 5, strike out the words "or may hereafter make," so that the line will read:

"Who has heretofore made entry under said laws."

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I very much hope the House will not adopt this amendment. This bill has been considered very carefully by the department and by the committee, and to strike out those words will change the whole purport and intention of the bill, and will make it necessary to come in and pass bills of this sort every year. This bill ought not to be amended and torn up and extended. It would be far beyond what was intended. Especially it ought not to be done by unanimous consent, and I hope the amendment will be voted down. The committee was somewhat reluctant to grant this relief, and now to try and extend the scope to allow every professional in the relinquishment business to take claim after claim is too much.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not mean that he hopes the committee amendment will be voted down.

Mr. FERRIS. No; it is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming. The custom has been every year to come in with a bill and allow every former homesteader to have a new homestead entry up to that time. This is sought to be obviated by this bill. We want to pass this bill to make rules and reasonable regulations, so that in the future an entryman who loses his right under no fault of his own and no fault of the Government may be given another homestead entry. The words are necessary and should not be stricken out.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman talks about not wanting the bill broadened. The trouble with the language which I seek to strike from the bill is that it does broaden the bill, and broadens it in an improper way. It lays down an altogether new and dangerous rule relative to homestead entries. The rule heretofore has been that one homestead entry exhausted the right. Congress from time to time relieved the entryman after an entry was lost under certain conditions. But to lay down a rule under which when an entryman makes an entry he can have the hope of making another entry, and still another for aught I know, is dangerous. I do not note anything in the law that would prevent him from making a third entry if this is passed. It is only a hope, however, for, in fact, under the conditions imposed, few could ever make a second entry.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Mr. MURDOCK) there were 9 ayes and 30 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer another amendment, to line 6, page 2, to strike out the words "through no fault of his own."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the difficulty with that language is that, interpreted as it is sure to be interpreted, there will be very few homestead entrymen who will secure the right to a second entry. The department will hold that the entryman must prove some condition entirely separate and apart from any fault of his own. Homestead entrymen abandon their entries in the main because they become discouraged; they have a dry season or two; conditions are not as they expected them to be; they may have sickness in the family and become discouraged, and in that way abandon their interest. But the land offices would hold that it is the entryman's fault if he leaves his entry. There is nothing in the conditions, as they ordinarily arise, absolutely compelling him to leave, and so the department would hold that the right of second entry did not apply.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Wyoming yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. That language "through no fault of his own," where it occurs in line 6, is descriptive in a way of a certain class of entry. Below in the proviso it is stated what the entryman shall show. Does the gentleman think, in addition to the requirements in the proviso, an entryman would have to show anything else? The first language is descriptive merely, and then it says:

Provided, That such applicant shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that the prior entry or entries were made in good faith, were lost, forfeited, or abandoned because of matters beyond his control, and that he has not speculated in his right nor committed a fraud or attempted fraud in connection with such prior entry or entries, and that he has not relinquished his former entry or entries for a valuable consideration in excess of his filing fees.

Now, I would like to know whether the entryman would be supposed to show anything in addition to the requirements of the proviso.

Mr. MONDELL. The words contained in lines 13 and 14, page 2, "matters beyond his control," relate back to the descriptive language in line 6, "through no fault of his own." He is compelled to show that he abandoned on account of matters beyond his control.

Mr. MANN. Personally I should think the bill would be identically the same with the language which the gentleman proposes to strike out in or out. I do not think it changes the meaning of the bill one iota.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Illinois will admit that in passing on the language in lines 13 and 14—"matters beyond his control"—the department will take into consideration the language which I have asked to have stricken out.

Mr. MANN. I do not think so.

Mr. MONDELL. If they did not, there is no reason why it should be in.

Mr. MANN. No special reason why it should be in, and there is no good reason for striking it out. It is intended to be descriptive. I suppose the object in putting it into the amendment was so that the entryman would not think that anybody could get a homestead entry. But when it comes to making application for a second entry, then you fix the requirement; it does not refer back to the descriptive matter, in my judgment.

Mr. MONDELL. The department would certainly interpret the language in the latter part of the bill in the light of the words I have referred to.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there are two classes of entrymen mentioned here, those who have heretofore made an entry and those who may hereafter make an entry, and that those who hereafter make an entry are not subjected at all to the clause which the gentleman moved to strike out—"through no fault of his own."

It reads in this way:

That any person otherwise duly qualified to make entry of public lands under the homestead or desert-land laws, who has heretofore made or may hereafter make entry under said laws, and who, through no fault of his own, may have lost, forfeited, or abandoned the same—

That, Mr. Speaker, is one class. Then the bill sets forth the other class, as follows:

Or who may hereafter lose, forfeit, or abandon same, shall be entitled to the benefits of the homestead or desert-land laws as though such former entry had never been made.

Those who may hereafter lose are not limited or required to lose through fault of their own. They may lose in the future for any reason, and on farther down in the bill it is provided that the consideration received in selling out must not be in excess of his filing fee. In other words, a man may simply abandon his entry or actually make an agreement with some one that he will abandon it if that other person will pay him his filing fees, and that is not under the ban of this bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. By what kind of reading does the gentleman from Washington get from the provisions of this bill that one who makes entry on land under the homestead laws hereafter will not come under the provisions contained in the bill where it says "through no fault of his own"?

Mr. BRYAN. If the gentlemen of the committee think that that is not a correct reading, there is no use to take up further time of the committee; but it seems to me perfectly plain that the provision "through no fault of his own" applies to one who has before the enactment of this measure lost his entry through no fault of his own, but that those who shall lose, quit, or sell out for filing fees after the passage of this act do not have to come under the provisions of "through no fault of his own" in order to have the right of a second entry. As I said before, the final proviso in the statute says that the consideration for selling out and quitting must not be in excess of his filing fees, and that actually gives legislative sanction to anybody giving up a first entry if he can get back his filing fees, and when he does get back his filing fees he then has abandoned it under conditions entirely beyond his control and through no fault of his own, so far as this act establishes such a requirement. I notice that the letter from Secretary Lane says he incloses a form of a bill which will be satisfactory to the department. It would help me greatly to see what kind of a bill the Secretary inclosed. That part of his letter is not published, and his letter thus becomes of slight value.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 18, after the word "fee," strike out the period and insert the words "and a reasonable value of the improvements he has placed thereon."

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object to the passage of this bill as it is, but I am very much in favor of the amendment which I have offered. I desire to commend the committee for bringing forward so favorable a bill to homesteaders as this is, and yet I think it would be improved by the amendment which I have offered. In lines 16, 17, and 18 it provides that a man may make his second entry providing he has not relinquished for a consideration in excess of his filing fees. I do not know why we should simply take that little $14 as the standard and say that if a man did not get any more for his claim than that that he could make a second entry, when another man who pays $14 for his entry and then goes on to the claim, lives there for two or three or four years, puts four or five years of hard work on it, puts a thousand dollars' worth of improvements upon it, and then perhaps loses his health or is confronted with other unfortunate circumstances and is compelled to leave the claim, and sells the claim for $500, he could not make a second entry. There is no justice in that.

In the administration of the law there is nothing impracticable in the proposition to give a man some allowance for the actual expenditure that he has put on the claim. Furthermore, in this day and age of the world, under the existing conditions of our public lands, when it is so difficult for a man to go out into the West on the lands which are now open to homestead entry and establish a homestead home and comply with the law, at a time when we ought to give every inducement possible for the men in the East to go out and help subdue the remaining public lands, and when that is the policy of the department and the National Government, as I understand it, to encourage the settlement of the western country, why should we not broaden the provision to give a man a second entry when he has lost his entry and has received no consideration above the value of his improvements? I say this amendment would be proper, and I hope the committee will accept it. I recognize how well the chairman of the committee understands such conditions, how men have spent money in his own country to improve claims and then have lost them. Good faith is a factor in all matters pertaining to the public lands. The man who enters a claim and does nothing but pay the filing fees has not proven even his good faith; but you allow him a second entry, even though he sold out for the pittance of the fees he has expended. But the man who goes upon a claim and puts substantial improvements on a claim has by this act proven his good faith. As long as he does not accept a consideration in excess of the money he has expended in improvements, it is consistent with justice and right that he should be allowed a second entry.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I shall not consume the time of the committee longer than a moment to say that this amendment should not be adopted under any circumstances. If you allow the entryman to get back, first, his filing fees, and, second, the price of his improvements, that will mean a squeezing into the trade of the whole performance, for he will be able to sell one relinquishment right after another. The relinquishment business is always frowned upon by the Government, and this will encourage it and cause it to thrive. This is a bad amendment and should by all means be rejected. The committee has traveled as far as possible already with second homesteads as they can go. The professional homesteader who speculates in relinquishments should not be aided. My genial and warm-hearted friend from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] has allowed his kind heart to outstrip his judgment. He knows and I know, and every other man knows who has lived in a land-office town that the relinquishment business is the one business that has always to be carefully guarded, because it is just a system of one man going on and speculating in one claim and selling out and taking another, and so on until there will be no end. I think the amendment ought to be voted down.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma) there were—ayes 11, noes 20.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer another amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order there is no quorum present.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimus consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SLAYDEN, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. STOUT, for five days, on account of important public business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Tuesday, April 7, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting draft of a bill amending the sundry civil act approved June 23, 1913, relating to residence for quarantine officer to be erected at Fort Monroe, Va. (H. Doc. No. 884), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. VOLLMER, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5079) for the relief of Mary Abel, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 508), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 7, 1914.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou hast put into the hearts of Thy children a deep sense of honor and justice, and Thou dost stand guard over the rights of all Thy children with sanctions of the Divine law. Thou hast given to us conscience to respond to the appeals of right, and Thou hast given to us Thy law to guide our steps in the right. We pray that this day, with glad response to Thy will, we may discharge our duties as in Thy sight and in Thy fear, and that we, as the stewards of God in the discharge of the great duties of this place and office, may have regard for the rights of all men and may so discharge them as that justice and judgment shall prevail in all the land. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 4943) to amend section 1 of an act of Congress approved April 9, 1912 (37 Stat., p. 80), entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to secure for the United States title to patented lands in the Yosemite National Park, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the House had passed, with amendments, the bill (S. 474) to authorize the issuance of absolute and unqualified patents to public lands in certain cases, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 4544. An act to reserve certain lands and to incorporate the same and make them a part of the Caribou National Forest Reserve;

H. R. 4988. An act to provide for the disposal of certain lands in the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, N. Dak.;

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. THOMAS. From the Committee on Woman Suffrage I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 130) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. I ask that the joint resolution may go to the calendar.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to raise the point of order as to whether a measure which has been considered at one session of Congress and acted upon is subject to consideration again at the same Congress. But, reserving that point, I do not object to the joint resolution going upon the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What is the point of order?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My point is that Congress can not at the same session reconsider a measure in the shape of a bill or joint resolution that has already been acted upon at that session of Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not advised as to the terms of the resolution so as to enable it to rule upon the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not asking for any ruling at present, because I have not objected to the joint resolution going upon the calendar. I think really it might have been made when the joint resolution was first introduced. I expect to raise it when an effort is made to bring up the joint resolution for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does not call for a ruling now. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

CAPT. HAROLD L. JACKSON.

Mr. DU PONT submitted a report (No. 409) to accompany the bill (S. 3768) to restore Capt. Harold L. Jackson, retired, to the active list of the Army, heretofore reported by him.

Mr. WEEKS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was ordered to be printed, and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for freight on bullion and coin, by registered mail or otherwise, between mints and assay offices from $10,000 to $30,000, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $29,600 for 23 stenographers hereafter allowed to Senators, at the rate of $1,200 each, for Senators having less than three employees in connection with their official work, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salary of the chief engineer in the office of the superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Department Building from $1,400 to $1,600 per annum, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was ordered to be printed, and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for horticultural investigations, etc., from $56,320 to $61,320, intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—EMELIA M'NICOL.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, it was Ordered, That the papers filed with the bill S. 808, Sixty-third Congress, granting a pension to Emelia McNicol be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

MONUMENT TO PRESIDENT JOHN TYLER.

Mr. SWANSON submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 22), which was referred to the Committee on the Library:

Whereas the Government of the United States has erected a monument in Hollywood Cemetery at Richmond, Va., over the grave of President John Tyler; and

Whereas exercises will be held very soon to unveil the said monument, and it being considered very appropriate that the Senate and House of Representatives should be properly represented on this occasion: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a committee of 10 Members be appointed, 5 by the President of the Senate and 5 by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to represent the Congress of the United States to attend said ceremonies, and authority is hereby given to expend $250 from the contingent fund of the Senate and $250 from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives to defray the expenses of said committee, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and the Committee on Accounts of the House of Representatives, respectively.

ADMINISTRATION OF PHILIPPINE AFFAIRS.

Mr. HOLLIS. I ask unanimous consent that a letter addressed by the Anti-Imperialist League to the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, a short letter of only one page, be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ANTI-IMPERIALIST LEAGUE,
Boston, March 18, 1914.

Hon. FRANCIS BURTON HARRISON,
Governor General of the Philippine Islands.

DEAR SIR: We have only refrained from writing to you before because of the fact that our organization, however unjustly, is branded as political, while your high office must be beyond even unjust suspicion of partisanship.

But as citizens of the United States, we feel that we are at liberty to express the opinion of a large group of like-minded persons who have admirably appreciated the success of your difficult and responsible administration of Philippine affairs. We know something of the complicated nature of the situation—the opposition of these interests which were counting upon the drift toward permanent colonialism as a guaranty of their investments or their business operations; the bureaucracy which had grown to be such a dangerous and powerful element; the American press in the islands hostile and bitter enemy of every concession made to the Filipinos; the powerful missionary influence exerted to prevent interference with proselytism in a Roman Catholic country; and the natural jealousies and discordances, though so wonderfully insignificant, among the Filipinos. Back of all we recognize the temporary annoyance caused by the malevolence of a portion of the American press, directly or indirectly subsidized by large financial interests, eager to disseminate and to magnify every element of doubt or uncertainty in the progress toward the promised Philippine independence.

You have conducted your high office, however, with calmness and dignity, but with an inflexible purpose to carry out the instructions of the Executive, while the succession of events has entirely justified your action and contradicted calumnies set afloat even before they had time to receive currency. We believe that with us you are looking toward the legislative promotion of the course being pursued toward the Philippine Islands which is soon to follow.

We are confident that you have engraved your name deeply upon the hearts of the Filipinos, and that it will be preserved as that of him who has done the largest practical part in carrying on to its fulfillment one of the greatest acts of the national atonement and restitution recorded in history. We are,

Your obedient servants,

MOORFIELD STOREY, President.
ERVING WINSLOW, Secretary.

CAPT. TEMPLIN M. POTTS.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, it is likely the Senate itself will have before it shortly the case of Capt. Templin M. Potts, United States Navy, who was plucked last year. In order that the Senate may be informed when the case reaches it, I ask unanimous consent for the publication in the RECORD, and also as a public document, of the matter I send to the desk. It is in the nature of a hearing before the Committee on Naval Affairs in regard to this case.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be printed as a public document or printed in the RECORD, whichever the Senator prefers, but not both. I do not believe it ought to be published in the RECORD and also as a document. Which would the Senator prefer?

Mr. TILLMAN. Let it be printed in the RECORD, then, and not as a document.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

TEMPLIN M. POTTS.

[Hearing before the Committee on Naval Affairs, United States Senate, 63d Cong., 2d sess., on S. 3804, a bill for the relief of Templin Morris Potts, captain on the retired list of the United States Navy.]

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 11, 1914.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met at 10.30 o'clock a. m. pursuant to the call of the chairman.

Present: Senators Tillman (chairman), Thornton, Bryan, Chilton, O'Gorman, Perkins, Clapp, Smith of South Carolina, Page, and Lodge. Also Capt. Templin M. Potts, Rear Admiral Osterhaus, Admiral Richard Wainwright, and Rear Admiral Victor Blue.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has assembled for the consideration of Senate bill 3804, as follows:

A bill for the relief of Templin Morris Potts, captain on the retired list of the United States Navy.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he is hereby authorized to appoint Templin Morris Potts, now a captain on the retired list of the United States Navy, to the active list of rear admirals of the United States Navy, to take rank next after Rear Admiral William B. Caperton, United States Navy: Provided, That the said Templin Morris Potts shall be carried as an additional number in the grade to which he may be appointed under this act or at any time thereafter promoted.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will first hear Capt. Potts.

STATEMENT OF CAPT. TEMPLIN M. POTTS, UNITED STATES NAVY.

Capt. POTTS. On the 26th of March, 1913, a vacancy occurred in the grade of rear admiral owing to the statutory retirement of Admiral Mertz, and in accordance with the law as senior captain I was ordered before a board of naval examiners to establish my fitness for promotion to the grade of rear admiral. This board was composed of Rear Admiral Osterhaus, late commander in chief of the Atlantic Fleet, and Rear Admirals Vreeland and Howard, late division commanders in the Atlantic Fleet—all three officers of wide experience.

On March 24, two days before I appeared before the board, the Secretary of the Navy addressed a letter to the board to the effect that the board would carefully scrutinize the records of all officers appearing before it, to determine beyond a shadow of a doubt whether they had had adequate sea service to perform all the duties at sea in the grade to which they were to be promoted. This order did not specifiy any fixed amount of sea service, but simply that the sea service should be adequate. I beg to call attention here to the fact that this special precept of the board was issued only two days before I appeared before it, and revoked a previous order of the Navy Department to the effect that it was not the function of the board to inquire into the character of service performed by an officer, but simply to carry out the law, which stated that the board would establish "the mental, moral, and professional qualifications of an officer to perform all the duties at sea and on shore in the next higher grade." The record which the board was called upon to scrutinize consists of reports of fitness submitted to the department semiannually by seniors upon juniors. These reports consist of a series of questions which the reporting officer is required to answer and to use only prescribed terms, as "excellent," "very good," "good," etc. The five most important questions in these reports are (1) ability to command, (2) professional ability in general, (3) manner of performing duties, (4) is this officer qualified to perform the duties of his grade? and (5) is this officer qualified to perform the duties of the next higher grade? My record was made up of reports by the Admiral of the Navy, Rear Admiral Leutze, Rear Admiral Wainwright, and Rear Admiral Vreeland. In answer to the first three of the above-mentioned questions, the mark assigned was "excellent," the highest mark attainable. The answer of these officers to the other two questions was "yes."

The board, after carefully considering my record and from their personal knowledge of me, covering a period of 40 years, reported that I was fully qualified to perform all the duties of a rear admiral at sea and on shore, and recommended me for promotion.

On the 10th of April I was ordered to sea again as a captain to command the battleship Louisiana, and on the same date the Secretary of the Navy addressed a letter to the president of the examining board stating that in the opinion of the department I had not had adequate sea service to demonstrate my fitness for promotion, and that I would be ordered to further duty afloat until such time as my sea experience demonstrated my fitness for promotion, when I would be given my commission of the original date of March 26, 1913. While in this probationary state I was selected for retirement by the so-called plucking board and placed on the retired list as a captain.

In spite of the report of the board of naval experts, which testified under oath that I was in every respect fitted to perform all the duties of a rear admiral at sea and on shore; in spite of the fact that four of the oldest, most experienced of the officers of the Navy have testified in my reports of fitness that I possess all the qualifications and was in every respect fitted to be a rear admiral in the Navy, the Secretary of the Navy, who had been in office about one month, and necessarily as a civilian, nonprofessional man, was unacquainted with the records of officers, their standing in the service, and the standing of the officers who composed the examining board, refused to accept the verdict of naval experts and ordered me to sea again to acquire further experience.

During the 50 years that the laws governing promotion in the Navy have been in force, this is the first instance that an officer has been deprived of merited promotion when he had been found qualified in accordance with law, regulation, and custom.

In spite of the fact that the Secretary informed the president of the examining board that my promotion was only deferred, I was subjected to a further injustice when my name was allowed to be placed before the plucking board for scrutiny. As the report of the board of examiners had inferentially been approved, except in so far as further sea experience was deemed necessary, I contend that I was in the position of a rear admiral subject to confirmation, and that my status as such should have removed me from the scrutiny of the so-called plucking board. My contention in this matter is borne out by the fact that Commander Philip Andrews, whose promotion to captain was denied him on account of insufficient sea service, is borne on the official register of the Navy Department of date of January 1, 1914, as a captain subject to confirmation.

Further, I beg to point out the statement of one member of the plucking board that I was retired because I have had insufficient sea service does not seem logical when I had more sea service in the aggregate than three of the five members of the board. I qualified for promotion under all laws and regulations of the Navy Department, under which I have served for nearly 41 years, and it seems unjust that I should have been deprived of my promotion on account of an order of the Secretary of the Navy, issued only two days before I was examined and three weeks after he had assumed charge of the Navy Department.

I contend that no precedent will be established by my restoration to the active list of the Navy. No such case has ever arisen in the Navy, and it is more than improbable that any officer of a good record, who came up for promotion within three weeks after a change of Secretaries, and who had obeyed all the orders, could be deprived of his promotion by an order, which, in my case, is ex post facto in effect.

Further, it would seem that if the Congress of the United States finds that an injustice has been done to an officer in the Navy through a change of Secretaries and their divergent ideas, that it would be the best precedent in the world to establish for the efficiency of the Navy that Congress should declare itself in favor of justice and equity.

I beg leave to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the table of sea service submitted by the department was incorrect. The department has removed from my record the two years that I was governor of the island of Guam, which, under a law several years old, was to be credited as sea service, and for years hundreds of officers who have served in the Philippines, Guam, Samoa, Cuba, and Porto Rico have been so credited. The order of the present Secretary revoking this order was not in effect when I was examined for promotion.

Further, the department has failed to show that while governor of Guam I was also in command of a seagoing vessel of the Navy in active commission; that I had assumed command of this vessel at Mare Island and commanded her on her passage to Guam, via Honolulu, and that I have never been relieved from the command of this ship and from all responsibility attached thereto for nearly two years, when I was ordered home.

Further, I was not only responsible for the safety of this ship, but for her condition, and in every respect was in the same category as a commanding officer of any other ship.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will now hear Rear Admiral Wainwright.

STATEMENT OF REAR ADMIRAL RICHARD WAINWRIGHT, UNITED STATES NAVY, RETIRED.

Admiral WAINWRIGHT. I am personally responsible for the orders detaching Capt. Potts from sea duty.

I have known Capt. Potts practically all his life, and he has always been considered one of our best officers. His reputation is higher than can be shown in mere efficiency records. His services as navigator of a battleship during the Spanish War, and afterwards as governor of Guam, and then as senior officer in command of several of our ships in Haitian waters during a revolution are well worthy of note.

When I was detached from the fleet and became the aid for operations, I found the office of Director of Naval Intelligence was vacant. As the director was my senior assistant and I needed an officer in whom I could place full confidence, I requested the Secretary of the Navy to order Capt. Potts to that position. He had commanded my flagship for 10 months and had fully demonstrated his ability for high command. Capt. Potts performed his new duties with characteristic ability and energy.

I beg leave to point out the importance of the Secretary's last letter to the board that examined Capt. Potts. [Capt. Potts here read the letter.] This letter is a qualified approval of the examination and definitely states that he will be promoted without loss of numbers. It seems to me that this letter removed Capt. Potts from the class of captains subject to the action of the "plucking board," as no one above the rank of captain can be selected out.

The cases presented by Admiral Blue are not parallel with that of Capt. Potts, as in no case would the officer have been raised above the grade of captain had he been confirmed in his new grade; and all were still liable, under the law, to the acts of the "plucking board."

I am firmly of the belief that the best interests of the naval service require the passage of the bill under consideration, and that the Government should have the advantage of Capt. Potts's knowledge and ability on the active list. His case can not be used as a precedent for other cases, as no one who had passed his examination for rear admiral has been selected out, and all officers have had due warning as to sea-service requirements.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will hear Rear Admiral Osterhaus.

STATEMENT OF REAR ADMIRAL H. OSTERHAUS, UNITED STATES NAVY, RETIRED.

Admiral OSTERHAUS. The board gave due consideration to the department's instructions regarding the examination of officers as to sea service, and after such consideration and examination of Capt. Potts's record—and its knowledge of his efficiency in command of a battleship of the fleet—all the members of the board having been associated in the fleet with him while performing such duty, were satisfied, without a doubt, that he was qualified for promotion, though he had but 10 months' service in command.

No period of sea service requisite to promotion for his or for any grade was fixed by the department.

There was no evidence before the board that Capt. Potts at any time sought to avoid sea duty.

Having commanded successfully and efficiently for 10 months, it could not be assumed that he would fail in a longer period, or could it be fairly doubted that Capt. Potts was qualified for promotion.

The CHAIRMAN. We will now hear from Rear Admiral Blue.

STATEMENT OF REAR ADMIRAL VICTOR BLUE, CHIEF OF THE BUREAU OF NAVIGATION.

Admiral BLUE. In representing the department in the case of Capt. Potts, now under consideration by the committee, it is my intention to show clearly that there is not now and never has been any personal animus or malice toward Capt. Potts in this matter and that every act of the department regarding the case has been in accordance with law and well-established precedents, as well as for the best interests of the naval service. Many adverse criticisms have been directed toward the department for its attitude in this case, as in many others where personal friends of the officers concerned actively interested themselves in their behalf. It is believed, however, that these criticisms have been principally due to a misunderstanding of the facts in the case and of the motives actuating the department. Heretofore no reply has been made, but advantage will now be taken of the opportunity given by this committee to set forth the department's position in its true light.

It is a fact generally well known that some officers of the Navy, either by favor or otherwise, have spent long and repeated tours of duty on shore, with correspondingly little active duty at sea. This practice had been developed by some officers to such an extent and in a sufficient number of instances to make it evident that it was exerting a most pernicious influence on the efficiency of the Navy, as well as causing dissatisfaction and discontent among the great majority of officers who take their "trick at the wheel," and who bear the burden and the heat of the day in keeping the fleet up to a high standard of efficiency.

When Mr. Daniels became Secretary of the Navy he began to look into this condition with a view to correcting the growing evil which was undermining not only the discipline but the efficiency of the Navy itself. Evidently if it could be made plain to the service that officers could not expect promotion in a seagoing profession unless they had adequate experience at sea, these adverse conditions could no longer continue. A firm stand had to be taken to accomplish the purpose.

Sections 1492–1510, Revised Statutes, provide that:

"All officers of the Navy, to be eligible for promotion, shall pass such professional, moral, mental, and physical examination as the Secretary of the Navy shall from time to time prescribe."

Under these statutes the Secretary acted; and if by so doing he changed the requirements for qualification of officers which had existed for 40 years—as claimed by Capt. Potts—there is hardly anyone who would seriously contend that it was not for the best interests of the Navy, or that the Secretary was not fulfilling a plain duty placed upon him by Congress.

The old adage that experience is the best teacher applies particularly to the qualifications of officers of the Navy, who, while commanding battleships or fleets, are responsible not only for the lives of those under their command and the enormous value of the public property intrusted to their charge, but also for the honor of the Nation in time of war.

If there is any grade in the Navy which should require the closest scrutiny of the qualifications of officers before promotion thereto, it certainly is the grade of rear admiral. It may be stated without fear of contradiction that the practice in vogue for the last 40 years—as referred to by Capt. Potts—permitted of making rear admirals by routine from officers who had arrived at the head of the captains' list. No sea-service qualifications were required, notwithstanding the fact that the Navy is essentially a seagoing profession and that Congress had intrusted to the Navy Department the responsibility of determining the fitness of officers for promotion. What has been the result? While it may be true that a number of officers of great ability, eminently qualified to lead the fleet into action, have reached in the past the grade of rear admiral without adequate sea service under the practice existing at the time, it is perhaps fortunate for the country that these same officers, or some of them, were not called upon to prove their fitness by the test of war under modern conditions. Unfortunately, there are others, as every officer in the Navy knows, who under the past system have reached the grade of rear admiral without adequate sea service, whom no Secretary of the Navy would feel justified in placing in important command afloat in time of war.

Our retired list, containing a number of rear admirals promoted to their grades under the practice advocated as proper by Capt. Potts, is a source of frequent complaint by Congress, and yet the present Secretary of the Navy is criticized adversely for changing, under the authority granted him by Congress itself, a practice admittedly wrong in principle and productive of inefficiency and increased expense to the Government. For all these years examining boards have been hampered in reaching their conclusions by the standards previously established. Woe to the members of any examining board who would violate the "inherent rights" of the senior captain by turning down his promotion to rear admiral unless there was something in his record distinctly to his discredit and for which they could not be assailed for rejecting him. Therefore, under the system in vogue for "40 years," as claimed by Capt. Potts, the examining boards could not be blamed entirely for passing to rear admiral captains whose fitness had not been thoroughly tried and proved by actual experience at sea.

With a view to improving conditions under the authority vested in him, the Secretary addressed the following letter to the examining board.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 24, 1913.

From: The Secretary of the Navy.
To: President examining board for the promotion of commissioned officers.
Subject: Sea-service qualification for promotion.

In accordance with sections 1493–1510, Revised Statutes (see Navy Regulations, 1913, ch. 31, art. 3331), the Secretary of the Navy from time to time prescribes the examinations for promotion of officers.

The Secretary wishes to inform the members of the examining board that he requires that officers coming up for promotion shall have had sufficient sea service in the grades from which they are to be promoted to insure beyond doubt that they are fully qualified and experienced at sea to perform the sea duties of the next higher grade.

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

On March 26, 1913, Capt. Potts appeared before the board for examination for promotion to the grade of rear admiral, being due by seniority as the senior captain to fill a vacancy made on that date by the retirement of Rear Admiral Mertz.

The report of the board in the case is given below:

"The board having deliberated on the evidence before it, decided that the mental, moral, and professional fitness of the candidate to perform all his duties at sea has been established to its satisfaction. In arriving at its conclusion as to the professional fitness of the candidate, the board noted that this officer has had but 10 months' sea service, but, as his record shows, that (he) has the mental, moral, and professional qualifications to perform efficiently all the duties, both at sea and on shore, of the grade to which he is to be promoted, and recommend him for promotion."

The board disregards the question of sea service except to note "that this officer has had but 10 months' sea service."

Section 1496, Revised Statutes, provides that—

"No line officer below the grade of commodore and no officer not of the line shall be promoted to a higher grade on the active list of the Navy until his mental, moral, and professional fitness to perform all his duties at sea have been established to the satisfaction of a board of examining officers appointed by the President."

Section 1502, Revised Statutes, provides that the findings of the examining board, together with the whole record in the case, shall be presented to the President for his approval or disapproval.

It is evident that the President is the final reviewing authority of the findings of an examining board, and that the findings are not complete until approved by him. In other words, the examination of an officer for promotion is not complete until the President has acted thereon, and in accordance with the law an officer is not qualified for promotion until his fitness has been established, not only to the satisfaction of the examining board but also to the satisfaction of the President as the final reviewing authority.

The records of the department show that during a period of 14 years immediately preceding the date of his examination, March 26, 1913, Capt. Potts had only 3 years of sea duty. Of this, he had 1 year and 5 months in the grade of lieutenant commander, 9½ months in the grade of commander, and 9½ months in the grade of captain, which sea duty terminated in December of 1909. The above includes 2½ months' sea duty credited to Capt. Potts while taking the station ship Supply out to Guam from California. This was inadvertently omitted in my oral statement before the committee, and I am glad of the opportunity to make the correction at this time. Some years ago it was customary for the governor of Guam to be in command of the station ship, although his residence was at Agana, 4 miles away from the anchorage. When Capt. Potts was ordered to Guam as governor the station ship Supply was at Mare Island. He accordingly assumed command of her on December 18, 1905, and took her to Guam, arriving March 2, 1906. The next day he went ashore and assumed the duties of governor. This gave him the 2½ months sea duty referred to, making a total sea duty of 3 years out of 14 years. While governor he was also in command of the station ship, although his habitual residence was at Agana, 4 miles away. When the station ship made periodical trips at sea she went under the command of Lieut. Commander Bitler, Capt. Potts remaining in Guam. Under these conditions it can not well be contended that sea duty should be credited to Capt. Potts for the period when he was governor of Guam and in command of the station ship. Such a construction placed upon the definition of sea duty would be stretching the meaning of the term to its elastic limit.

The average length of sea duty of officers reaching the head of the captain's list during the past year, excluding one officer whose physical disability prevented his going to sea, was 6 years and 10 months for the preceding period of 14 years. This average is 10 months more than twice the amount Capt. Potts had for a like period of 14 years. While, of course, it is incumbent on every officer to obey orders and accept assignments to duty, it must be assumed that an officer who stood in so high favor with the authorities that he could obtain the most desirable shore billets for long periods of time could also, if he so desired, obtain a billet at sea.

Owing to the great responsibilities that necessarily fall upon an officer of the rank of rear admiral in command of a fleet, squadron, or division, and to the lack of experience of Capt. Potts at sea, the President withheld his approval of the findings of the examining board until such time as Capt. Potts's experience at sea would be sufficient to demonstrate his qualifications.

The following letter, which explains itself, was then sent to the president of the examining board, and Capt. Potts was shortly afterwards ordered to command the battleship Louisiana:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 9, 1913.

From: The Secretary of the Navy.
To: Rear Admiral Hugo Osterhaus, United States Navy, president Naval Examining Board.
Subject: Report of examining board in the case of Capt. Templin M. Potts, United States Navy.

Referring to the report of the examining board, of which you were president, in the case of Capt. Templin M. Potts, United States Navy, in which the board notes the small amount of sea service of this officer since he entered the grade of captain, the department desires to inform the board that it does not consider a period of 10 months' sea service as a captain sufficient to establish the professional qualifications of an officer to perform efficiently all the duties of the grade to which he is to be promoted.

Capt. Potts will therefore be detailed to duty afloat until such time as his experience at sea is sufficient to demonstrate his qualifications, when he will receive his commission, bearing date of March 26, 1913, in the grade for which he has been examined.

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

There are numerous precedents of record in the department wherein the President withheld his approval of favorable findings of examining boards in cases of officers coming up for promotion. There are even cases in which approval has been withheld for years for one reason or another, and in every case the officer concerned retained the rank of the grade in which he was serving at the time he became due by seniority for promotion until his case was finally settled and his commission in the higher grade confirmed by the Senate. In the meantime his name has been carried in the Navy Register for convenience of reference in a position on the list of officers where his original seniority placed him with a notation indicating his status.

The point made by Capt. Potts that the name of Philip Andrews, whose case is similar to his own, is now carried on the Navy Register in the captains' list is not well taken. There are other officers carried in the same manner in grades to which they will eventually be commissioned when their qualifications, physical and otherwise, have been determined and their commissions confirmed by the Senate. Until such confirmation takes place, however, these officers continue to hold the rank they held before coming due for promotion. This practice is so old and so well known that it hardly seems necessary to refer to it here. It is only mentioned because Capt. Potts made a point of it to show that if his name had been carried on the list of rear admirals he would not have been available for selection out.

The act of Congress of March 3, 1899, provides as follows in section 9:

"That should it be found at the end of any fiscal year that the retirements pursuant to the provisions of law now in force, the voluntary retirements provided for in this act, and casualties are not sufficient to cause the average vacancies enumerated in section 8 of this act, the Secretary of the Navy shall, on or about the 1st day of June, convene a board of five rear admirals, and shall place at its disposal the service and medical records on file in the Navy Department of all officers in the grades of captain, commander, lieutenant commander, and lieutenant. The board shall then select, as soon as practicable after the 1st day of July, a sufficient number of officers from the before-mentioned grades, as constituted on the 30th day of June of that year, to cause the average vacancies enumerated in section 8 of this act. Each member of said board shall swear or affirm that he will, without prejudice or partiality, and having in view solely the special fitness of officers and the efficiency of the naval service, perform the duties imposed upon him by this act. Its finding, which shall be in writing, signed by all the members, not less than four governing, shall be transmitted to the President, who shall thereupon, by order, make the transfers of such officers to the retired list as are selected by the board: Provided, That not more than five captains, four commanders, four lieutenant commanders, and two lieutenants are so retired in any one year. The promotions to fill the vacancies thus created shall date from the 30th day of June of the current year: And provided further, That any officer retired under the provisions of this section shall be retired with the rank and three-fourths the sea pay of the next higher grade, including the grade of commodore, which is retained on the retired list for this purpose."

This act created the board of selection for retirement, which is sometimes spoken of as the "plucking board." It will be noted that when first enacted it provided for selecting an officer from one grade and placing him upon the retired list in the next higher grade. This provision, however, was modified by the act of August, 1912, which provided that the officer concerned should be retired in the grade from which selected and not in the next higher grade.

When the time came to appoint this board the Secretary gave directions that the members should be selected from widely separated localities, and that none of them should in any way be identified with the administration of the Navy Department. This was done for obvious reasons. There had previously been criticisms of the board's action in certain cases owing to the fact that members of the board were also on duty in the Navy Department.

The board was appointed as follows: Rear Admiral Ward, from New York; Read Admiral Southerland, recently from the Pacific Fleet; Rear Admiral Knight, commander in chief of the Atlantic Reserve Fleet at Philadelphia; Read Admiral Winslow, commanding, second division, Atlantic Fleet; Rear Admiral Fletcher, commanding, third division, Atlantic Fleet. Commander Pollock, who had recently come from sea to duty at the Naval Observatory, was made recorder.

The board met on June 2, and addressed the following letter to the Secretary of the Navy:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 2, 1913.

From: President board of selection for retirement.
To: Secretary of the Navy.
Subject: Name of officer at head of list of captain, commander, lieutenant commander, lieutenant, and junior lieutenant.

The board requests to be informed what officers are legally at present, for the purposes of the board, the senior officer on the list of captains, commanders, lieutenant commanders, lieutenants, and junior lieutenants.

AARON WARD.

On the same day the department forwarded to the board a letter giving the names of the officers in the various grades and their status. Letter follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 2, 1913.

To: President board on selection for retirement.
Subject: Name of officer at head of list of captain, commander, lieutenant commander, lieutenant, and lieutenant (junior grade).
Reference: Letter of 6/2/13.

At present the senior officers in the grades referred to in letter of June 2, 1913, are as follows:

Capt. T. M. Potts. (Is slated for promotion to rear admiral from March 26, 1913, but has not yet been commissioned.)

Commander Philip Andrews. (Is slated for promotion to captain from March 26, 1913, but has not yet been commissioned.)

Lieut. Commander C. C. Fewel. (Is slated for promotion to commander from March 26, 1913, but has not yet been commissioned.)

Lieut. E. H. Dodd. (Is slated for promotion to lieutenant commander from March 26, 1913, but has not yet been commissioned.)

Lieut. C. R. Train. (Is slated for promotion to lieutenant commander from March 26, 1913, but has not yet been commissioned. He is No. 2 on the list of lieutenants, as C. P. Huff has been commissioned lieutenant commander from February 13, 1913.)

Lieut. H. W. Osterhaus. (Is slated for promotion to lieutenant commander from March 30, 1913, but has not yet been commissioned. Is No. 3 on list of lieutenants.)

In this connection attention is invited to the lists of officers in the grades referred to, shown in the corrected copies of the 1913 Navy Register furnished the board by the Bureau of Navigation. All captains, commanders, lieutenant commanders, and lieutenants—the grades considered by the board in making its selections—are indicated therein and appear in lineal standing.

F. D. ROOSEVELT.

It will be noted that the head of each grade was due by seniority for promotion but had not been commissioned pending the establishment of his qualifications.

The board on June 7 forwarded a letter to the department asking specifically if Capt. Potts was legally available for selection.

Letter follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., June 7, 1913.

To: Secretary of the Navy.
Subject: Re status of Capt. Templin M. Potts.

Referring to the board's letter of June 2, 1913, and the department's reply 1303–114 of the same date:

The board requests to be informed whether Capt. Templin M. Potts, who has passed his examination for promotion to the grade of rear admiral, United States Navy, the record being still in the hands of the President, and who is "slated for promotion to rear admiral from March 26, 1913, but has not yet been commissioned," is legally available for selection by this board from the grade of captain, United States Navy, for compulsory retirement in that grade under the provisions of section 9 of the Navy personnel act of Congress, approved March 3, 1899, as modified by the act of Congress of August 22, 1912.

AARON WARD.

The department replied with the following letter:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 7, 1913.

From: Secretary of the Navy.
To: Rear Admiral Aaron Ward, United States Navy, president board of selection for retirement, Navy Department (through Bureau of Navigation).
Subject: Re status of Capt Templin M. Potts.
Reference: Your letter 6–7–13.

1. The status of the above-named officer is that of a captain on the active list of the Navy, not an extra number; he is therefore "legally available for selection" by the board "from the grade of captain, United States Navy, for compulsory retirement in that grade" under the provisions of law in your letter.

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

The statement in this letter that the status of Capt. Potts was at the time that of a captain has so long been borne out by practice and precedents as well as by judicial decision that it is deemed unnecessary to dwell further on the point.

As to the question whether or not he was "legally available for selection" by the board "from the grade of captain," the conclusion follows naturally from the premises. If his legal status was that of a captain, then he was "legally available for selection from the grade of captain." In as much as both Admiral Wainwright, who appeared before your committee as counsel for Capt. Potts, and Capt. Potts himself have held high positions in the administration of the Navy Department and are presumably familiar with its previous rulings in similar cases, it is surprising that they should contend to the contrary view before this committee as they did in their oral statements at the time of the hearing. Furthermore, in 1911, Admiral Wainwright himself was aid for operations in the Navy Department and also president of the board for selection for retirement, which selected for retirement J. H. Rowen from the list of lieutenant commanders. Lieut. Commander Rowen had become due for promotion to commander on May 19, 1911. He had been examined, found qualified, and recommended for promotion by the examining board. The findings of the board had been approved by the President, making the entire proceedings complete in determining the fitness of this officer for promotion. All that remained to be done to make him a full-fledged commander was, in the ordinary routine of business, to send his name to the Senate for confirmation. Yet while this was pending Mr. Rowen was selected for retirement in the status of a lieutenant commander. On June 30, 1909, Lieut. Commander Glennie Tarbox, who had become due for promotion to commander more than six months previously, and the establishment of whose qualifications was pending, was selected for retirement in the status of a lieutenant commander. Admiral Wainwright was a member of the board in this case also, as he was in other cases of officers who made their numbers for the next higher grade shortly before, or about the time, they were selected for retirement as in the status of the lower grade.

Admiral Wainwright is referred to in connection with these cases only for the purpose of showing that he is presumably cognizant of precedents previously established by the department. There is no question as to the legality of the proceedings in any of the cases referred to.

If Rowen was legally available for selection from the grade of lieutenant commander, surely Capt. Potts was legally available for selection from the grade of captain. If, as Admiral Wainwright claimed before the committee, there is a difference between the two cases, the difference is in Rowen's favor, as the findings and recommendation of the examining board in his case had been approved by the President. The act of the President completed all legal requirements for establishing his qualification for promotion. This was not so in the case of Capt. Potts, as the President had withheld his approval of the findings and recommendation of the board.

The fact that Rowen was retired in the next higher grade does not alter the case, as the law in force at the time expressly so provided. The only modification of the law was made in August of 1912, and this was to the effect that officers would be retired in the grade from which selected. The law as modified was in operation when Capt. Potts was retired, hence his retirement in the grade of captain.

Naturally there is much disappointment for all officers whose careers are cut short by their being selected for retirement. There is, however, no greater disappointment for an officer who has reached the rank of captain to have his career terminated than there is for one who has reached the rank of commander or lieutenant commander. Perhaps, on the other hand, the officer who reaches the rank of captain before retirement should consider himself even more fortunate than those who fall by the wayside as commanders or lieutenant commanders.

ORIGIN OF THE BOARD OF SELECTION FOR RETIREMENT.

The method of promotion in the Navy is by seniority, subject to examination, in accordance with laws quoted above. Prior to the year 1899 this had resulted in causing officers to pass through the grades of commander, captain, commodore, and rear admiral in a few years' time. Many of them reached the grade of rear admiral just in time to retire at the age of 62 without remaining long enough to go to sea. The net result was a retired list overburdened with rear admirals, some of whom did little or no duty as such before retirement. Another result was the advanced ages at which officers reached the upper grades, and the rapidity of passing through them with a corresponding loss of efficiency of the service. To correct these conditions Congress passed the act of March 3, 1899, section 9 of which, quoted above, created the board.

Some means of elimination of officers is necessary if the Navy is to be efficient and if the retired list is to be guarded against an unnecessary overload of rear admirals.

As long as the present law governing such matters is on the statute books it is the plain duty of the Navy Department to enforce its provisions in regard to all officers concerned. This has been consistently done by every administration since the enactment of the law. During one administration the President even went so far as to veto a bill enacted by Congress reinstating to the active list two officers who had been retired in accordance with the above-mentioned law.

Probably every officer retired under its provisions has a grievance, fancied or real, which could easily excite the sympathy of his friends and cause them to believe that injustice had been done. To restore one of these officers to the active list would weaken the hands of the department in the enforcement of the law, as well as set a precedent which would most likely be far-reaching in its effects and unfavorable to the efficiency of the service.

STATEMENT OF CAPT. TEMPLIN M. POTTS WITH REFERENCE TO STATEMENTS OF REAR ADMIRAL VICTOR BLUE, CHIEF OF THE BUREAU OF NAVIGATION, BEFORE THE SENATE NAVAL COMMITTEE WEDNESDAY, MARCH 11, 1914.

Admiral Blue states as follows:

"Sections 1492–1510, Revised Statutes, provide that—

"'All officers of the Navy, to be eligible for promotion, shall pass such professional, moral, mental, and physical examination as the Secretary of the Navy shall from time to time prescribe.'

"Under these statutes the Secretary acted; and if by so doing he changed the requirements for qualification of officers which had existed for 40 years (as claimed by Capt. Potts) there is hardly anyone who would seriously contend that it was not for the best interests of the Navy, or that the Secretary was not fulfilling a plain duty placed upon him by Congress."

I beg leave to call the attention of the committee to the fact that no such statute as quoted above exists, and, further, that under the Revised Statutes no authority whatever is vested in the Secretary of the Navy to change or make requirements for the qualification of officers for promotion.

Section 1496, Revised Statutes, provides that—

"No line officer below the grade of commodore and no officer not of the line shall be promoted to a higher grade on the active list of the Navy until his mental, moral, and professional fitness to perform all his duties at sea have been established to the satisfaction of a board of examining officers appointed by the President."

This statute is perfectly clear, that the establishment of the professional fitness of officers is vested in a board of naval experts appointed by the President. The letter of the Secretary of the Navy to the president of my examining board fixing requirements as to sufficient sea service is, in my opinion, not sanctioned by law, but contravenes it. It is true that reports of examining boards must be submitted to the President of the United States for his approval or disapproval. In my case the President has not disapproved the report of my examining board, but, according to a letter addressed to the president of my board by the Secretary of the Navy, a qualified approval was given, namely, that I was to be promoted without further examination after having performed a further period of duty afloat.

The tenor of the statements of Rear Admiral Blue with regard to my promotion is to the effect that I ought not to be competent, whilst my entire record and the report of the board of examiners prove beyond a shadow of a doubt that I am, and was on March 26, 1913, fully qualified to perform all the duties of a rear admiral, afloat or ashore.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 30, 1908.

PRESIDENT NAVAL EXAMINING BOARD,
Mills Building, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 4th ultimo regarding the case of Commander Henry C. Gearing, United States Navy, you are informed that the department does not consider that the naval examining board should take cognizance of the character of "sea service" of an officer as shown in the Navy Register, or that it should consider to his detriment the fact that an officer may have been assigned to duty by the department that might necessitate his continuing on duty on shore during the whole period of a commission.

The board is required under the law to satisfy itself as to whether or not an officer "has the mental, moral, and professional qualifications to perform efficiently all the duties, both at sea and on shore, of the grade to which he is promoted." Under this law the examining board may submit an officer to such examination as it sees fit in order to determine the question of fitness.

Respectfully,

TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY,
Secretary.

BUREAU OF NAVIGATION, January 7, 1914.

A true copy from the records of this bureau.

BRITTAIN, Assistant to Bureau.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 323, submitted by Mr. POINDEXTER on the 1st instant, as follows:

Whereas the British Embassy to the United States has formally, in writing, admitted that we have a right to exempt our coastwise trade from Panama Canal tolls, and the British minister of foreign affairs has officially, in writing, declared that many of the material provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty do not apply to the Panama Canal, because that canal was constructed under conditions not contemplated by either party at the time the treaty was made; and

Whereas the "particular object" of both the Clayton-Bulwer and the Hay-Pauncefote treaties was the construction of a canal at Nicaragua, and the "general principle" referred to in said treaties contemplated and expressly stated that a treaty should be made with reference to a particular canal, and no such treaty has been made with reference to Panama; and

Whereas the United States acquired the Panama Railway and the Panama Canal wholly from the Republic of Colombia, the French Canal Co., and the Republic of Panama, and not from Great Britain, and that Great Britain had no rights, titles, or claims of any kind whatsoever in or to said Panama Railway or Panama Canal or the country in which the same were built, and never asserted any such claim or interest either to said French Canal Co., the Republic of Colombia, or the Republic of Panama, and has no such interest or legal rigat now, either by treaty or otherwise; and

Whereas our policy as to canal tolls was settled by act of Congress and by the official statement of the last administration made to the British Government; and

Whereas, notwithstanding the aforesaid formal admissions of the British Embassy and the British minister of state for foreign affairs, and notwithstanding after full consideration the question was solemnly settled by both the executive and legislative branches of this Government, the President on the 5th of March last appeared in person before the Congress and "urged with the utmost earnestness of which he was capable," upon the ground of his own "personal responsibility," that the position so deliberately taken by this Government be reversed, and that his request be granted "in ungrudging measure," without "raising the question of whether we were right or wrong," and no reasons are given by the President for his conclusions, and the request is based especially on the ground that he "shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence" unless it shall be granted; and

Whereas no statement has been made to Congress what these matters are, and in order to act advisedly on said request it is essential that the Senate shall be informed thereon, and if they are of such near consequence and great delicacy as to require a surrender to foreign opinion without question as to whether we were right or wrong, the Senate can not properly consider the question submitted and many other vital questions before it without being advised as to the nature and identity of said matters referred to by the President, and it is the desire of the Senate to give thorough consideration to the views of the President: Therefore it is

Resolved by the Senate, That the President is hereby respectfully requested to inform the Senate, in confidence if he so desires, what are the unnamed matters of "nearer consequence and greater delicacy" referred to in said message; and

Resolved further, That action on the bill for the repeal of the tolls exemption clause of the Panama Canal act, and all consideration thereof by the Senate or by the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, be deferred until the information called for by this resolution can be obtained.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] has given notice that he intends to address the Senate this morning upon the tolls question, I do not desire to occupy the time of the Senate in speaking upon this resolution. In fact, I do not know that at any time I will speak upon it, because the questions involved in the measure which has come over from the House to which this resolution refers are so vital and concern the fundamental economic interests of the Pacific coast so especially and to such an extent that it would be perfectly futile to undertake to discuss them during the morning hour.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I am very much in hopes that what this resolution calls for, leaving out the facts recited in the preamble, will be conceded. I hope the resolution itself will not be objected to. The message of the President calls for very unusual action. It calls for the reversal of the position which this country has deliberately taken. That must be conceded, whether we agree with the correctness of that position or not. It has been taken after a political campaign in which the issues were discussed when they were made up by planks in the platforms of the several parties. They were thoroughly understood, and they have been debated by lawyers in Congress and out of Congress. When the President asked Congress to reverse that attitude because of the existence of certain important reasons which he intimates exist, without saying what they are, I take it for granted that if the President himself is asked in respectful terms by Congress to state what those reasons are he will not object. I apprehend that the President will be glad to give to Congress these reasons. I myself should like to know whether the reasons which he refers to relate to the international affairs of the country or whether they relate to transportation problems.

I should like to know, and I think Congress ought to know, whether the desire to impose tolls on American shipping going through this canal, which is an object very much desired by the railroads of the country, for obvious reasons, because it limits the effects and the results of putting into operation this new means of transcontinental transportation, as a regulator of railroad rates, when every competing canal that has been constructed by this country has been, as we have learned by experience, a regulator of railroad rates—I should like to know whether the desire to put this obstacle in the way of the free operation of the canal comes from the same motive that has been stated as coming from the White House in connection with the nomination of Mr. Daniels as a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission—that he "did not want to destroy business," that it was time to "let up on the railroads," and such statements as that.

I should like to have the President given an opportunity, by a respectful request from Congress, to state to Congress whether these reasons relate to the foreign affairs of the country or whether it is a desire to relieve the railroads in what seems to be considered a stress in their affairs from the full competition of a waterway which must have the effect of reducing their rates, while a number of them have applications pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission for an increase in rates—an application said to be favored by the administration.

Of course, Mr. President, if this question is to be decided upon the same grounds that I have heard argued so much in the Senate, and out of the Senate by Members of the Senate in statements made elsewhere, that we must support the repeal of the toll-exemption clause in order to keep the Democratic Party together; that we must vote for this measure because the President asks for it—if that is to be the controlling principle in the action of Congress upon this matter, I admit that this resolution is perfectly futile, because it would make no difference what the reasons are so long as the President says that there are good and sufficient reasons.

Mr. President, there is not a court in the United States of the humblest character that would be called upon to decide the most trivial case between two private litigants that would not demand, before it rendered its judgment, to know the facts upon which it was asked to decide.

The President of the United States has made, I am very frank to say, a most enviable record in a great many of the important measures with which this administration has had to deal during the brief period since it has had control of the affairs of the Government; I have not hesitated to support the administration with my vote here when the reasons adduced seemed to be sufficient to convince me that it was right and to express my approval of its action not only here but everywhere I was called upon to express it; but it seems to me, Mr. President, that if the decision of Congress upon this question is to be confined to the proposition that the administration desires this legislation, if the President is to use his power to control not only the executive but the legislative branches of this Government, it is time that we consider some new disposition in the relation of these two great branches of the Government.

If we are to decide this tolls question merely upon the request of the President, without knowing the reasons which impel him to make that request, then I say that the form of the Government ought to be so modified that the President will take his seat here with us and match reason with reason and leadership with leadership. If the President is to become a part of Congress, if our system is to merge the different branches of the Government and do away with what we have all been taught from infancy was one of the fundamental principles—the division between the executive, legislative, and the judicial departments—we can not make that change and carry it on successfully under the Constitution as it now exists. If the President is to exercise that power, then it would behoove us to consider some fundamental changes and to inquire whether or not the President should not be chosen from among the membership elected by the people into their great legislative body.

It is a strange thing that the entire reputation of this administration is based not upon an executive administration, not upon a record of the performance of executive duties, but upon a legislative record. It is based upon what has been accomplished in Congress. I should like to see the effect upon this country if the President would turn his attention for a little while away from the duties and functions of Congress and exercise his great abilities in the performance of the functions of the President, the greatest official in the world.

The Czar of Russia has but little power compared with him, because the Czar is a part of an official family, surrounded by factotums who tell him what to do. The King of England is largely a formal dignitary, a sort of social leader, though the place may be a balance-wheel, as it were, in the constitutional machinery of the country. The Kaiser of Germany has more power, perhaps, than any other monarch in Europe, but he is surrounded and hedged in by constitutional limitations, by customs, and the necessity of consulting officials before he acts. Whom does the President have to consult? He is absolute within the great range of his powers; and yet he apparently neglects the exercise of the great discretion that is vested in him, and bases his reputation and the record of his administration upon what Congress may do. If the President should for one day exercise the power that he has to enforce the law against the great violators of the law it would clear up the social and the political atmosphere of this country like an electrical storm.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Washington has just made a very interesting statement; but I ask if it is not true that there is in nature a law that requires a moving body to always choose the path of least resistance? Is it not possible that the President of the United States finds it easier to command Congress than to perform his executive duties?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was interrupted at the close of the Senator's question. I heard the first part of it but I did not hear its conclusion.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask if it is not possible that the President is simply obeying a law of nature, namely, choosing the path of least resistance, and that he occupies his time in legislative work because he finds it easier to command Congress than to perform his executive functions?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Evidently, Mr. President, that is the case; and I think the evolution of society and the evolution of politics are subject to that law of following the line of least resistance, the same as is the development of the material world.

I did not intend to go into this phase of this question at this time, but one thing leads to another, and for that reason I hesitated to say a word this morning, because I prefer to discuss this great question when it is really before the Senate for action. Some time ago I referred to a statement made by one of the distinguished Senators from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] because of the weight of his opinion. He later on appeared in the Senate and corroborated the statements which were attributed to him by the press, which were to the effect that after having visited the President he had found that there were such reasons in existence, such reasons presented to him by the President, as to cause him to reverse the attitude which he himself had taken upon this great question and to announce that he would vote to support the President in his request for the repeal of the tolls-exemption clause. The Senator from Louisiana, however, in that statement failed to take the Senate or the country into his confidence and to tell us what reasons the President whispered into his ear or told him in the privacy of his interview, but they were sufficient to control his action. If we knew them, they might be sufficient to control ours. Why not pass this resolution and give the President an opportunity, in a formal, constitutional way, to tell us what he told the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, inasmuch as the Senator from Washington has seen fit to allude to myself in this matter, I will say that the statement which I incorporated in my answer given to him on the 10th day of March, as I now remember, embodied my reasons for my change of view—not my change of view as to the legal right of the United States to exempt coastwise trade from the payment of tolls if it chose to exercise that right, but my reasons for sustaining the President at this time in his wish to have the exemption clause repealed. Most certainly I did not say what special, particular reasons in the way of diplomatic secrets or matters of that kind had been given to me, because none had been given to me. I set up in that answer the reason why I had changed. The President of the United States, however, has not whispered in my ear, as the Senator says, and I object to such an allusion. I said that the entire correspondence between us had been in writing; that because of my illness, not being able to call on the President, I had taken the initiative in the matter and had asked him in writing to state to me whether or not he considered that the public interest required that the toll-exemption clause should be repealed; and I gave as my conclusion in the matter that on account of what he had answered me in that letter—and I gave substantially his language in the letter—I had changed my views and felt it my public duty to support the President in this matter.

As a matter of course, I never presumed to ask the President as to any secret diplomatic knowledge that he had in the matter. That would have been entirely presumptuous, in my opinion, on my part. It was enough for me for the President of the United States to say to me "he felt absolutely sure that the repeal of the exemption clause would greatly strengthen his hand in carrying to a successful conduction the foreign policy of this Government"; and his word for that was sufficient for me.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, that simply serves——

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator from Rhode Island will pardon me, that simply serves to deepen the mystery. What the Senator from Louisiana has just said corroborates in every way the impression which I had formed, that there were reasons—evidently mysterious ones, because there is difficulty in finding out what they are—which were sufficient to control the action of the Senator from Louisiana; or I may perhaps infer that the Senator from Louisiana is satisfied not to inquire into reasons for his vote upon important matters in the Senate other than that the President desires it.

The President says that there are some diplomatic reasons which are sufficient; and the Senator from Louisiana deems it an impertinence, he says, to inquire of the President what those reasons are. I suppose he would deem it an impertinence to use his own judgment as to whether or not they were sufficient. Perhaps it would be deemed an impertinence for the Senate of the United States, which is asked here to take action upon this question, to inquire what these reasons are or to use its judgment as to whether or not they are sufficient to cause this Nation, in the face of a foreign demand, to change its attitude upon this great question.

I remember one of the statements made by the Senator from Louisiana that seemed significant to me—although I may have attached too much importance to it—to the effect that while we might have a right to exempt our coastwise trade, there was a difference between having a right and being able to enforce that right.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to say that I never used the language "being able to enforce it." I said, "and the enforcement of it," "and to enforce it."

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am willing to accept the amendment, but it seems to me that the effect of the language is just the same. The difference between having a right and the enforcement of the right is a new doctrine in America. There never was such a difference between having a right and the power to enforce the right in 1776 or in 1812 or at any other time when the vital interests of this country came into conflict with the demands of a foreign nation. The right and the power to enforce the right in the history of this country have usually, have always, heretofore gone hand in hand, and we are not ready to accept this new doctrine announced in this mysterious way by this administration, that we have a right which we may not enforce.

I have in my hand, Mr. President, another statement of which I am reminded by the statement of the Senator from Louisiana. It bears on its face the appearance of having been carefully prepared, probably in writing, by Representative A. MITCHELL PALMER. I only give it for what it is worth, because I have not undertaken to verify it, and I do it because all of these gentlemen are in the city and can make any correction which may be necessary if there is any error. He says:

> The one big, vital issue which furnishes the Democrats who will support the President an impregnable position—

Now, you would think that he was going to proceed to state some great fundamental reason why the Democrats should support the President; why they should take this new position in defiance of their platform and campaign pledges upon this question, but what does he say—and I think it illustrates generally the attitude of the Democratic Party? He says:

> * * * lies in the international aspect of the case. The sentiment of the country will not be formed either on the interpretation of the treaty—

He apparently, like the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], who assumed to be spokesman for the administration in this matter, is ready to admit that there is nothing in the treaty which prevents us from favoring our own coastwise vessels, if we see fit, but there is something in the international aspect, and he says:

> The sentiment of the country will not be formed either on the interpretation of the treaty or as to whether the exemption constitutes a ship subsidy. It will center around the fact that the President, charged by the Constitution with the guardianship of our international relations, has said that he can not perform his office in this respect unless the obstacle reared by the tolls-exemption clause is wiped out.

There is one great fundamental reason, he says; and what is it? That the President has said that it must be wiped out.

Mr. President, in view of the fact that other Senators have given notice of their intention of speaking upon this question, and in view of the fact that a number of Senators will not readily agree to the recitals of facts contained in this resolution—which, however, I will say in passing I have very carefully verified, and at the proper time I shall undertake to demonstrate that they are correct statements of fact—I regard them as unimportant, so far as the purpose of the resolution is concerned, and would ask leave to substitute in place of the resolution simply the resolving part of it, leaving out entirely the preamble.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, this resolution, with the preamble stricken out, reads:

Resolved by the Senate, That the President is hereby respectfully requested to inform the Senate, in confidence if he so desires, what are the unnamed matters of "nearer consequence and greater delicacy" referred to in said message; and

Resolved further, That action on the bill for the repeal of the tolls-exemption clause of the Panama Canal act, and all consideration thereof by the Senate or by the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, be deferred until the information called for by this resolution can be obtained.

Mr. President, I am familiar with the President's message on this question. The matter in this resolution in quotation marks—to wit, the words "nearer consequence and greater delicacy"—is a quotation from the message of the President. Those matters he describes as being of great delicacy. The President is the head of the executive branch of this Government and is the official spokesman for the Nation in reference to our foreign affairs.

I should like to know, if it could be properly divulged, exactly what the President had in mind when he used this language which has been quoted, exactly what the delicate situation is, and what the foreign relations involved in this question are; but I appreciate perfectly that in the President's opinion it might not be proper for him to state what they are at this time, and to the entire Senate. The possible preservation of the secrecy of the executive business of the Senate is not quite so reliable as it used to be; and although the resolution states that the revelation, if it comes, is to be made in confidence if the President so desires, I do not know whether every Senator would deem himself bound by the confidence reposed in him if he should take it into his head that some great principle to which he had consecrated himself required that the public should be taken into his confidence.

The Committee on Interoceanic Canals, which have this whole matter under consideration at present, met this morning, and they decided that on Thursday they would hear the authors of the various bills pending before them in relation to the modification of the existing law upon this subject if the authors of the bills desired to be heard, and that later on they would grant hearings, at least for 15 days, to other parties. This resolution, if adopted by the Senate, would hold up——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think the Senator correctly states the action of the committee. I understood the Senator to say that the committee would first hear the authors of the several bills, beginning on Thursday, and that afterwards the committee would give 15 days' hearings to other persons. The determination of the committee, I think, was that we would begin hearings on Thursday, and would conclude them at the end of 15 days.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I did not so understand it, but I stand corrected if the fact is so. What I understand is that we meet Thursday, at which time the various bills before the committee, of which there are six or eight, will be taken up and considered, and that the authors of those bills may be heard if they desire to be heard; and that then, at later hearings, to be held as quickly as possible, we will hear other parties in interest.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the resolution——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is perfectly immaterial, however. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. The resolution was that the hearings should begin on the 9th of April and end in 15 days after that time. The Senator is correct in all other particulars.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. My opinion is still the same, though of course I freely accord to the Senator the right to have his understanding in the matter. Just as the committee adjourned I stated to the chairman of the committee, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], that that was my understanding, and I understood him to agree with me; but it is perfectly immaterial so far as the point I now desire to make is concerned.

We have decided to have hearings at least for 15 days, or so much of that time as may be required, commencing on the 9th of April—day after to-morrow. This resolution, if adopted by the Senate, will prohibit the committee to which the Senate has referred these matters for consideration from even entering upon their consideration until the President complies with the request for this information. Suppose the President should advise us that, in his opinion, it is incompatible with the public interest to disclose whatever motives he had in his mind, or whatever communications, confidential or otherwise, he may have had from foreign powers, involving perhaps their relations with each other and with us. It seems to me the operation of this resolution would be to hold up the entire project until the President complies with our respectful request, the penalty of denying which is "nothing doing."

As I say, I should like to know all that the President knows about this matter, and I hope he can disclose something to us; but I shall not ask him to do so and do not want him to do so if in his judgment it is not in the interest of the public, if it brings our foreign relations into any peril or is calculated to make any trouble for us of an international character or to furnish any ground for any nation to claim that the President of the United States has done anything indiscreet or undiplomatic or anything lacking in international delicacy or courtesy or consideration for other nations.

Therefore, in view of these things, I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I was not aware that this question was to be brought up this morning. I am trying to decide on which side I shall stand when it comes to a final vote on the Panama tolls question. In studying the matter, my mind constantly comes back to this address of the President and to what seems to me the very extraordinary language which he has used in that paper.

I desire to read the last two clauses of it. Speaking of the tolls question, he says:

> We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and for the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation.
> I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy—
>
> I emphasize the word "the"—
> of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that no more extraordinary language was ever submitted to this body; for we are asked to do something whether it is right or wrong. Even if we are in the right there is some reason of so much importance in connection with this matter, in the President's opinion, that it is necessary for us to reverse our action, although we have the right to perform it, for the purpose of accomplishing some other result. That other result, he says, is "the foreign policy of the administration."

I do not understand that in our relations with other nations there is any such thing as "the" policy. Our relations with the nations of the world are very complicated. They include a very large number of questions. On each one of those questions we must have such a thing as a policy. The language implies that there is only one policy. It leaves us entirely in the dark as to what the particular question is in respect to which the word "policy" is used.

We have one policy in regard to the Mexican question. We have one policy in regard to Japanese questions. We have one policy with reference to the tolls question. The whole effect of the language of the President therefore is to involve this subject in an air of mystery and secrecy.

I want, and I feel that every Member of this body should want, to give the most respectful consideration to the opinions and desires of the President of the United States in regard to foreign matters. I have no desire, in connection with this question, to be governed by its relations to our partisan domestic politics. I think it should be decided on broader grounds. I can not, however, pursue my own processes of thought to a conclusion on this matter unless I know what in the world the President means by the language he has used in this message.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LIPPITT. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. BORAH. Would the Senator be willing to reverse our position whether we are right or wrong, regardless of what the foreign policy may be? Does the Senator mean to say that he is in a frame of mind that a foreign situation would lead him to vote to sacrifice the interests of the American people, if he looked at the matter in that way, simply because of a strained situation abroad. If the Senator is satisfied that we clearly had the right to pass the statute, that under the treaty we had the right to exempt, and that economically it was a wise thing to do, what difference does it make what the foreign situation is, unless the Senator is prepared to say that he will yield the rights of the American people because some foreign power demands it? I was opposed to this resolution, because I do not care what the foreign situation is, if we are wrong we should recede and repeal the law, if we are right we should maintain our position regardless and, if need be, in defiance of all foreign powers.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I would not yield up the rights of the American people because some foreign power demanded it; but there might be various circumstances in which I would yield up a right that the American people had. The relations of nations are not different from the relations of men. It frequently happens in negotiations between individuals that an occasion arises in which one of the negotiators has a right, and knows it is his right, and has no intention of putting himself in any position where he denies that he has that right; but nevertheless, for the purpose of conciliation, for the purpose of good fellowship, for various reasons that are satisfactory to himself, he decides to yield up the powers he may have under that right, not necessarily because it is demanded, but perhaps because he wants to retain the good opinion of the parties with whom he is dealing.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I should like to be allowed to go on. The Senator simply asked me whether there was any occasion on which I might be in favor of this country giving up a right. Yes; I will say categorically that there are such occasions. Whether or not there is anything in this matter that would induce me to give up our rights is exactly what I am trying to discover. It is exactly what the President of the United States ought to tell us in the frankest language.

We should not be left in the dark in this matter. Great questions of public policy can not be decided without the facts being in the possession of those whose duty it is to decide them. It is our duty to decide what course the Senate is going to take on this question; and unless we have the facts given to us in the fullest confidence, and so that we can thoroughly understand them, we are in no position to do it. As I have said, I desire to decide this question as correctly as I can, according to my convictions about the matter as they may come from extended consideration of it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. LIPPITT. In just a moment. The very first thing that I am brought up against is the very extraordinary position which the President of the United States has taken, and which I can not get by, if I am going to accord to him the respect and confidence I wish to accord to the man at the head of this Nation.

I now yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I was much impressed by the statement of the Senator from Rhode Island that under certain circumstances he would be prepared to surrender American rights at the behest of a foreign power.

Mr. LIPPITT. I did not say that, Mr. President. I distinctly said that I would not do it as the result of a demand. I said there might be circumstances and conditions in which I would. I was not referring to this question.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Very well. Then may I ask the Senator whether he can conceive of any circumstances that would induce him to agree to the surrender of rights of sovereignty of the American Nation?

Mr. LIPPITT. I do not know exactly what the Senator means.

Mr. O'GORMAN. What I mean is, would the Senator consent to a surrender of national rights, the attributes of sovereignty? There may be a difference between the rights of nations——

Mr. LIPPITT. That is such a general question that I am not prepared to answer it. We are talking about a definite thing, and I can not make a statement of what I might do on some question I do not understand. I will say this, though, that, looking at our relations in the broadest way, a nation is not weak when it voluntarily concedes to another friendly nation something that that nation wants as an act of friendship, although it might have the right to refuse it. One of the greatest attributes of power is to be so powerful that you do not fear to be generous.

Mr. O'GORMAN. May I ask the Senator another question? Does he think that the Senators of the United States, the accredited representatives of the American people, clothed with a sacred trust to safeguard the rights of all the American people, have the right to be generous with the rights of the people? Should not their generosity be confined to individual and private possessions?

Mr. LIPPITT. I do not know, Mr. President, that I want to go into those metaphysical questions just at this moment. They are very broad questions and I should want to consider them carefully before taking a stand.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LIPPITT. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may be permitted to make a suggestion to the Senator from Rhode Island, there is certainly a distinction between rights of sovereignty and claimed rights of sovereignty or disputed rights of sovereignty.

Mr. LIPPITT. I am aware of the distinction to which the Senator refers.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. LIPPITT. I always yield with pleasure to my friend from New Jersey.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think it would be better that this great body of representatives of the people should first be just to the people before it is generous to the English people?

Mr. LIPPITT. It might be, Mr. President, that being generous would at some times on some occasion be the greatest and the best way of being just, but——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I would rather reverse the proposition.

Mr. LIPPITT. I do not want to discuss these metaphysical questions. What I have been trying to say and to impress upon the Members of this body is that I am very anxious, not for partisan purposes, but for the purposes of a proper and correct solution of this question upon which I at this moment am in doubt as to what side I shall stand on, to have outside light thrown upon this matter.

The President goes on to say:

> I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in an ungrudging measure.

When he says this I presume he means that he and his advisers, his administration, do not know. I suggest that when a person says he does not know how to deal with a question it means he feels himself incompetent. A man does not know how to do a thing because he has not the ability to do it or he has not the knowledge to do it. It seems to me that if this is a question of that kind, and the President and his advisers have not the ability to decide it, no better solution of the question could be made than to ask the advice and consent of the Senate in regard to how this question should be decided, or these questions—I do not know whether they are one or many.

Sometimes a man is not able to decide a question because he fears something in regard to its solution. It has been intimated in reference to this very language of the President that there are some complications of such a nature that he fears the consequences. I think if that is the underlying fact in regard to it, this body should know what it is and to what he fears. We are not a nation of such small consequence that such a matter as fear should be allowed to enter into the solution of any question. Yet this language implies that there are complications the results of which the President is afraid.

Mr. President, the President of the United States on this question is reversing a policy which he has advocated very generally before the people. He is reversing in this message another policy which he advocated no less broadly and frequently, and upon which he went to the American people for their verdict, and on which they supported him. I wish to read from an address of his which was published in his book called The New Freedom, saying "Let there be light." What he says there is so perfectly apposite to the position he has taken in the latter part of his message that I think the two things should be considered in conjunction with each other. He says:

> In the first place, it is necessary to open up all the processes of our politics. They have been too secret, too complicated, too roundabout. They have consisted too much of private conferences and secret understandings.

Then he goes on to say:

> What are the right methods of politics? Why, the right methods are those of public discussion.

Again, he says:

> If there is nothing to conceal, then why conceal it? If it is a public game, why play it in private? If it is a public game, then why not come out into the open and play it in public?

Then he announces his position on these matters:

> I, for one—

He says—

> have the conviction that government ought to be all outside and no inside. I, for my part, believe that there ought to be no place where anything can be done that everybody does not know about. * * * The very fact that so much in politics is done in the dark, behind closed doors, promotes suspicion.

Certainly that language is clear and broad enough to cover almost any question that can be brought up. Nevertheless, the President of the United States puts this great question up to the United States Senate and up to the American people and involves it in such secrecy and in such darkness that, although it is now some five weeks since that message was delivered, I have not been able to find any man anywhere who knows what in the world the President is talking about. I have asked people who were in a position generally to know what this administration has in its mind and what that language referred to, and I have not been able to get any light upon the situation at all. This message is too important to be allowed to sink out of sight. It is the language of the President of the United States, the head of the Nation, dealing with our relations with other people of great consequence.

I hope, Mr. President, that the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber, who are responsible for what this body does, will give this request of the Senator from Washington very careful consideration. I do not know about the particular language in his resolution, but I am talking about the principle of it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LIPPITT. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will permit me, while he is speaking upon that point, I ask leave to present a substitute for the resolution, in order to reduce it to its simplest form and confine it to the one condition which the Senator is now speaking about. I send to the desk the following modification and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington submits a modification of his resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be respectfully requested to inform the Senate, in so far as not incompatible with the public interest, in confidence if he so desires, what "other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence" are referred to in the President's message of March 5, 1914, and to so inform the Senate what connection such matters have with the proposed repeal of the toll-exemption provision of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, when the Senator from Washington interrupted me, I was going on to say I did not know whether the particular language used in his resolution of inquiry was the best language to use or whether there was some other form of putting the general principle which is involved in his resolution that will be more acceptable to the President of the United States and to his advisers; but I do think that in some form the President of the United States should be asked by this body to plainly state what he means by the language of his message. I believe, sir, that he is on record in the most positive way by the language which I have read here from his addresses not to do things in secret and in the dark. He has involved this whole question in a mystery which, so far as I am concerned, it is impossible to penetrate. He is not doing himself justice, and he is not doing this body justice, and he is not doing the American people justice unless while we have this question in our minds for decision we are given all the facts on which to decide it.

A great many years ago I did a foolish thing because a man told me that unless I did it then I never could obtain certain results, and I made up my mind as the result of that experience that I was not going at any other point in my life to take any action because somebody threatened me with some mysterious consequence. I am brought here face to face with a threat of some mysterious involved circumstance about which I can not find out anything, and I am told that I must do this thing, even if I have a right to do something else, because something will happen to the Nation which I represent if I do not.

Gentlemen of the Democratic Party, it is not a fair condition for the President of the United States to involve this question in, and I hope that he will be requested by this Senate to take us into his confidence and to take the American people into his confidence, that we and they may decide it with as full knowledge of the facts as he thinks he possesses.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I do not see the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] here, but the reason that Senator gave for referring the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations seems to have been removed by the modification made of the resolution. I see that the Senator from Connecticut is now here.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator from Wyoming if he thinks it is possible to submit any information to the entire United States Senate in confidence?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not care whether the President submits this information in confidence or not, it is information the Senate of the United States is entitled to have, because the President of the United States has removed this question from the economic policies of the Nation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Was not the Senator referring, though, to the additional words, "in confidence, if he so desires"?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Not at all. I was referring to the words which the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] urged as an objection to the resolution being passed in the present form, where the resolution prohibits the Committee on Interoceanic Canals from taking any action whatever. That objection is removed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator's face was turned in the other direction and I did not catch exactly what he said. I misunderstood him.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator from Connecticut, however, has returned to the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut, to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The motion is pending, and I have nothing to say.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], who is absent from the city. I do not know what position he takes on this question, and I will withhold my vote.

Mr. KERN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY] to the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] and vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I take the liberty of transferring that pair to my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], who is absent. On that account I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. I understand that he would vote "yea" if he were here, and I will therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). Has the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. WEEKS. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], who is absent on account of illness. I therefore withheld my vote. I now transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and vote "nay."

Mr. DU PONT. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is absent on account of official business and that he has a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

I also desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY]. As has been stated, he has a general pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

Mr. MYERS. I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce for the day the absence of my colleague [Mr. CULBERSON] who is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT].

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] on account of sickness in his family. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. He is paired with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] on official business. He has a general pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. If my colleague were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY. I was requested to announce the necessary absence of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], who are paired.

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 27, as follows:

So Mr. POINDEXTER's resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PROPOSED RULE RELATIVE TO EXECUTIVE SESSIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the following resolution (S. Res. 327), submitted by Mr. KENYON on the 4th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the judgment of the Senate that all executive sessions shall hereafter be open to the public, except when treaties are considered or when the Senate, by unanimous consent, orders otherwise; and the Committee on Rules is directed to prepare such amendments to the present rules, or to prepare new rules, or both, as may be necessary to carry out the terms of this resolution, and present the same to the Senate for action thereon.

Mr. KENYON. There is a point of order pending relative to the resolution, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is impressed with the idea that the point of order is not well taken. The resolution does not propose an amendment to the rules at all, but is simply a proposition to test the sense of the Senate upon the question of instructing the Committee on Rules to report a new rule. So the point of order is overruled.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I do not know whether that is a debatable motion, but I merely wish to say that the motion is, of course, entirely illogical, because the resolution is to direct the Committee on Rules to do certain things if the sense of the Senate be so and so; and it seems to me we might as well test this question right out on the resolution and ascertain whether the Senate is or is not in favor of getting rid of secrecy as to certain phases of executive sessions.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. I do not think it is of any use to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules. If that is an illogical motion, I will make a motion which I think is logical. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. KERN. I am unable to see anything illogical about the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut, to lay the resolution on the table, which is not debatable. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. KENYON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BRISTOW. Will the Chair please state the question upon which we are now to vote?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] moved to refer to the Committee on Rules the resolution which the Chair laid before the Senate and which was read by the Secretary. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] has moved to lay the resolution on the table, which motion, in the opinion of the Chair, has precedence. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KERN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. KENYON (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE's name was called). I desire to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent from the city. Were the Senator from Wisconsin present he would vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I again transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. In the absence of my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND], I take the liberty of transferring my pair with the Senator from Missouri to him and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. On account of his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], and therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. On this question he would vote "yea." I will therefore take the privilege of voting. I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON], I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DU PONT. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 30, as follows:

YEAS—31.

So Mr. KENYON's resolution was laid on the table.

THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 330, submitted by Mr. BRANDEGEE on the 6th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the President is hereby requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to cause to be transmitted to the Senate all information, papers, correspondence, and records in the Department of State relative to the negotiation and ratification of the so-called Hay-Pauncefote treaty signed November 18, 1901.

Mr. BRANDEGEE obtained the floor.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, I move——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish, first, to make a few brief remarks and then I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. President, yesterday the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] made an extremely interesting and able address on the proposition to repeal the provision of law which exempts coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls through the Panama Canal, and in the course of his address he quoted somewhat from documents which he said he had had the privilege of inspecting—I assume he meant in the Department of State. I understand that the Secretary of State has appeared at least once before the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I think in relation to this matter. I may be mistaken about that, for I am not a member of the committee; but, whether he has done so or not, the Senator from North Dakota has had access to these records in the State Department, and I do not know whether they extend that courtesy to Senators other than those upon the Foreign Relations Committee. I think that I would like the privilege of inspecting the papers to which the Senator from North Dakota alluded and from which he quoted to some extent, and possibly other Senators would also like that privilege. I do not want in any way to have anything revealed that is improper for the entire public to know about the history that led up to the adoption of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; but, in as much as the construction of that treaty is one of the vital questions involved in the discussion of the pending legislation to repeal the exemption clause of the Panama Canal act, I should like all the information I can get upon its history, with the idea that it may throw some light upon the construction of the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Just a moment, and I will yield to the Senator. I do not want to embarrass the Senate or the State Department or anybody else in this matter, and so I have put in the usual provision that this information be transmitted, if not incompatible with the public interests. If the information is here already in any publication, I do not care to insist upon action this morning, and in any event I had at the time I introduced the resolution and still have the idea that it should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I desire to make the motion that it be referred to that committee.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I merely desire to say that so far as my knowledge goes the Secretary of State has never appeared before the committee in regard to any of this correspondence. I think the correspondence has been largely printed in the volumes of foreign relations. As to that I will not be sure, but it seems to me it ought to be printed. I can not see any possible objection to printing now all the correspondence that led up to the two Hay-Pauncefote treaties, so that we shall have all the negotiations from the beginning. I can see no possible objection to it, and unless the acting chairman of the committee desires otherwise I can see no reason for a reference. I should think the resolution might be adopted now.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, in view of what the Senator has said I wish to say that this resolution was drawn by me very hurriedly in lead pencil at the time the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] was making his speech, and construed literally I do not think it would include the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which was first submitted to the Senate and which was withdrawn and another one, which is actually in existence to-day, afterwards prepared.

Mr. LODGE. The negotiation of the first treaty is a part of the negotiation that led up to the second one.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is part of the negotiation of the second one, and while, as I say, I do not insist upon action this morning, neither do I insist upon delay if the Foreign Relations Committee do not consider it a matter to which they care to give any private consideration. Therefore if they have no objection I am willing that the resolution shall be acted upon this morning.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator from Massachusetts is quite right in saying that the Secretary of State has not been before the committee in relation to this matter. The statement is likewise correct that substantially all, if not all, of these documents and records have been published. A long series of them was published in the RECORD over a year ago. They are matters that I can see no objection to republishing. There is no occasion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I am quite willing that it be adopted in the form presented without reference.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to inquire if the resolution will also include the correspondence between Secretary Knox and the British Embassy in regard to the interpretation of the treaty, had two years ago? Is that included?

Mr. LODGE. It is all here now.

Mr. WORKS. All of the matter that Senators are talking about has been published, and I expect to comment upon it if I get an opportunity.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator is correct about that, there would be no use in passing the resolution. If he is incorrect, there would be some use.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this resolution does not cover simply letters—correspondence; it calls for all information, papers, correspondence, and records, in the State Department. If the Senator has examined those matters in the State Department and compared them with what is in print in the document room, I do not question that he is right.

Mr. WORKS. I have no objection to the resolution being passed, if it is the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I simply want to have it complete here. If it is not complete, if the resolution is agreed to it will be made complete, if not incompatible with the public interest.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question. Would his resolution cover the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and the communications between the United States and Great Britain between the time of that treaty and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, no. It is designed to put into my possession, and that of other Senators, all the information to which the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] alluded yesterday, and anything more the State Department may have concerning the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and the negotiations which led up to it. I would not consider that the language of the resolution would go back to the negotiations which led up to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Mr. LODGE. Everything relating to that is in print, and has been for years.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am asking about the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and the correspondence between the two countries relating to the latter treaty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Massachusetts says that is all in print.

Mr. CUMMINS. That treaty and the communications between the two countries have very much to do, I think, with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and its proper interpretation.

Mr. LODGE. This resolution, as I understand, will cover all the correspondence relating to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as the origin of the negotiations for the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It will not take in the correspondence of 1850. That has been put in print since then.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not mean that. I mean the correspondence since 1850, relating to the meaning of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and the conduct of the countries which were parties to it.

Mr. LODGE. That will cover it all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, replying to the Senator from Iowa, I will say that it seems to me the question he asks should be answered in the affirmative, for this reason: The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was in existence at the time the negotiations commenced for superseding and supplanting it by the existing treaty. Therefore I hardly see how the correspondence to get rid of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and adopt the Hay-Pauncefote treaty could be sent to us without its covering the information suggested by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, of course the negotiations for the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which was followed by the second ratified treaty, started with the wish of our Government, expressed to the British Government, to get rid of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It all started with that, of course. I think the Senator's resolution covers all that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand we were the initiators and the makers of the request for the new treaty.

Mr. LODGE. We were.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LOCATION OF FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, in the city of New Orleans last Saturday, the 4th of April, a monster mass meeting was held for the purpose of protesting against what they deemed to be the unfair location of Federal reserve banks and the injection of politics into the national banking system. A copy of the resolutions adopted at that meeting has been sent to me by the mayor of the city, presiding at the meeting, and a number of telegrams have also been sent to me urging that I read the resolutions to the Senate. I have risen for that purpose; and if there be any objection to their being read at the desk, I will read them in my place.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I am asked to read these resolutions. I have a right to speak in my place here as a Senator. That has been repeatedly ruled, and it was ruled that way the other day. I will therefore read these resolutions. They are very brief.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I had given notice that I should speak to-day on the Panama Canal tolls question. I have waited very patiently to secure the opportunity to go on with my address. Unless I can proceed within a very few minutes my opportunity to speak to-day will be gone. I insist upon my right to proceed under my notice.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, has the Chair announced that morning business is closed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then the point of order made by the Senator from Georgia is perfectly good. The regular order is the consideration of business on the calendar, if we are through with resolutions and reports and bills.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, the Chair ruled the other day that when a Senator got on his feet in the morning hour and began to talk he had a right to talk on anything he pleased.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana is mistaken as to the ruling of the Chair. The Chair ruled the other morning that when a matter was pending before the Senate, and a Senator was recognized by the Chair, he could talk about anything he pleased, but he must be talking to some question pending before the Senate.

Mr. RANSDELL. I did not so understand the ruling.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was the ruling of the Chair. The Chair has ruled so often on that question that it is one thing about which the Chair is sure.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will ask, then, that these resolutions may be printed in the RECORD. I understand that the Senator from Georgia wishes to have a refutation printed at the same time. I have no objection to that. I simply wish this matter to come before the country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall be ready to-morrow morning to print an answer, but I am not ready this morning to print an answer. I have not it in shape to print. If the Senator will wait until to-morrow morning and then present the resolutions, I shall not object to their going into the RECORD; and I shall be ready then to print, immediately after them, the reply.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from Louisiana to print in the RECORD the resolutions referred to by him?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator from Georgia object?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then that settles it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Did the Senator from Georgia object, or not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He did.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to announce that if I can get the floor I desire to read these resolutions this afternoon. I am sure the Senator from Georgia ought not to object, since he has gotten this bank which my people thought they were entitled to have. The resolutions have already been read on the floor of the House of Representatives. The Senator surely does not object to having the statement of the people of Louisiana laid before the Senate and before the American people; and if he is not ready to answer it, he ought to be ready.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, when the subject of oral discussion is in order, when we may all speak, I shall be ready; and when the Senator reads the resolutions, if a subject is before the Senate that allows debate, I shall present an answer at once, with ease.

[Some routine business was transacted, which appears under appropriate heading.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. WORKS obtained the floor.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield for a moment?

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I have been yielding pretty much all the morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is proper for the Chair to state that the Chair understood the Senator from Mississippi to call for the regular order.

Mr. WORKS. As I understand the rule of the Senate, where a notice is given by a Senator it is always respected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no rule of the Senate that authorizes any Senator——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I withdraw the call for the regular order so far as the speech of the Senator from California is concerned.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This was from the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, my sole object in making the point of order was that I hoped we would get to the calendar and use the time before the expiration of the morning hour in the consideration of business on the calendar. I had no desire to prevent the Senator from California going on after that; but as it is now within six minutes of the expiration of the morning hour we could not dispose of anything anyhow. I shall hereafter insist, however, that until the morning hour has expired neither notices nor anything else except unanimous consents of the Senate, or conference reports, or other privileged matters, shall interfere with the consideration of the calendar.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California has the floor. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WORKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent of the Senate that Senate bill 4405——

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I am not going to yield for a motion to take up some other matter.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to ask that this bill be set down as a special order for Thursday next.

Mr. WORKS. That will undoubtedly involve discussion, Mr. President. I can not yield for that purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What bill is that?

Mr. WALSH. The bill to encourage the production and mining of radium. I have heretofore endeavored to impress the Senate with the idea that our radium lands in the West are being rapidly absorbed by locators——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am familiar with that bill.

Mr. WALSH. And they are going away from us every day at the rate of a hundred locations a month in many localities. Unless we get this matter under consideration some time in the near future every vestige of our lands containing this valuable metal will have passed away from us, and we will have no control at all over them.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I must decline to yield at the present time under the circumstances. I should be glad to oblige the Senator from Montana, but the conditions are such that I must decline to yield.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to say to the Senator from California that of course I should not have asked him to yield on any matter that was going to create any discussion. I asked him to yield merely that I might inquire whether, by unanimous consent, this bill might be set down as a special order for Thursday next. Of course, if the Senator declines to permit the inquiry whether that can be done or not——

Mr. WORKS. That would involve a calling of the roll to bring a quorum into the Senate.

TREATY RELATIONS WITH GREAT BRITAIN AND PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the bill to repeal the clause of the Panama Canal act that exempts our coastwise ships from the payment of tolls presents a very simple question. It is a question of right or wrong, a question of national integrity and honor.

In 1901 we entered into a treaty with Great Britain which had in contemplation the construction of a canal across the Isthmus connecting the two great oceans, the Atlantic and the Pacific. That treaty provided for the construction of a canal by the United States. We built the canal with our own money, on our own territory. We assumed the whole responsibility of maintaining and operating the canal for all time to come. We had no aid of any kind from any other nation. Under those circumstances we believed we had the right to allow our own coastwise ships to pass through our own canal without the payment of tolls.

Another false and spurious issue has been brought into this controversy, however. The President has asked Congress to repeal this clause in the statute whether we were right or wrong in enacting it. In other words, he asks us, as the representatives of this Nation, to waive trial, to plead guilty to having violated a solemn treaty made with a foreign nation, and to having defrauded that nation of its rights.

It is a humiliating request to present to an American Congress. If we were wrong in passing the statute, we should have the moral courage to set that wrong right by any means that may be necessary to accomplish that result. On the other hand, if we were right in granting this privilege to our own people, we should have the courage, the manhood, and the patriotism to stand by that right in the face of all the world.

There is another issue which has been presented here that is quite as humiliating as the other. The platform of the Democratic Party declares explicitly in favor of exemption from tolls. The President of the United States has repudiated that plank in the platform, and insists that it was an error on the part of Congress and the then President of the United States to have passed the statute at all.

Mr. President, what has the Democratic platform to do with the question of the proper construction of a treaty made between this country and a foreign nation? What has the politics of any political party to do with our obligations under that treaty? What have the power and the influence of the President of the United States to do with the obligation of a United States Senator in dealing with this question under the oath he has taken? The Constitution and laws of this country are above all political platforms. The oath of a Senator is higher and more binding than any pledge he can make to his political party.

As I said in the beginning, this is a very simple question. It is one that should be determined wholly and entirely upon its merits. I have no disposition to criticize the President for having repudiated or violated his party platform. If he believed it to be his duty as President of the United States to take the course he has taken in this matter, notwithstanding the plank in his party platform, it does him honor that he has had the courage of his convictions and has presented the question to the consideration of the Congress of the United States.

But, sir, in a matter of this kind the platform of a political party should have its proper influence. Every officer elected upon a platform declaring certain principles should be morally bound by that platform, unless his official duties and obligations call upon him to violate it. If the President has, by the course he has taken, violated his party platform, and is not able to give good reasons therefor, he should be held accountable to the party that elected him to his great office.

But, sir, I am not concerned in this discussion about politics or party platforms. I am not concerned with the convictions of the President, unless those convictions are so presented to me as to appeal to my reason and judgment. What I want to know, what I have been trying to find out, and what I propose to submit to the consideration of the Senate is whether we were right or wrong in exempting our coastwise ships from the payment of tolls for passing through our canal. If we were right in extending that privilege to our own people, I shall never consent to surrender it to any foreign nation upon its demand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 156, relative to expenditures for telegrams sent by Senators.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily, the consideration of it to be resumed immediately upon the completion of the remarks of the Senator from California.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from California will proceed.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, reference has been made here and great reliance has been placed by some Senators who have discussed this question upon two previous treaties made before the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. One of them is the treaty which was made between the British Government and the Governments of Turkey, Egypt, and others, relating to the control of the Suez Canal, commonly known as the treaty of Constantinople. The other is the treaty so often referred to, known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Almost every argument that has been made in support of the British contention in this matter has been founded upon the conditions and the principles that are alleged to have been declared by those earlier conventions between the several Governments I have mentioned. But I undertake to say that neither one of those treaties has any more to do with this question than a chapter in the Bible. So far as the principles of the treaty of Constantinople and the Clayton-Bulwer treaty are concerned, no principle of either one of those conventions is brought into this matter except by the express terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. There is no bringing in of those treaties or any principle they have declared by a reference to the treaty making it a part of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. What was done was simply to refer to those former treaties and to declare an intention to set out in this treaty the principles that were contained in the earlier treaties. If you will examine and compare these treaties, you will find that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty contained, in terms, all the provisions necessary to carry out the principles of the earlier treaties, so far as those principles were applicable to the conditions prevailing at the time of the execution of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

So I say to the Senate that this whole question is dependent upon the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and nothing else. It is impossible that the principles of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as they are set forth in article 8 of that treaty should apply to the conditions that prevail under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Under that treaty the two Governments, Great Britain and this country, practically entered into a partnership by which they agreed and bound themselves in the first instance to use their endeavors to induce somebody else to construct the canal. They bound and obligated themselves to protect jointly not only the canal that was to be constructed in that way, but those who had taken upon themselves, whether a government or private individuals, the obligation of constructing the canal.

Under that treaty it was provided that these two nations should stand upon an exact equality, and why should they not? Their obligations were precisely the same. Their interest in the canal was the same. They were involved in exactly the same obligations toward it. Therefore, it was agreed between them that they should stand upon an equality with respect to the control of the canal and the free use of it for their ships.

That treaty was applicable to the conditions as they existed at that time. But they went further than that. They provided upon what terms other nations might participate in an equal way in the benefits of the canal. What was the condition upon which they were to be allowed to use it? It was the condition that these other nations should do just what Great Britain and the United States had done—make themselves responsible for the protection and care and maintenance of the canal. Whenever another nation came into this compact by accepting the terms which had been imposed by the two parties who had made the agreement, they were entitled to exactly the same consideration in the use of the canal as the parties to the treaty, because they had placed themselves upon an equal footing with the other two nations. Under that treaty nobody could participate in the use of the canal on equal terms unless they complied with the condition requiring them to become protectors of the canal jointly with the two nations which had originally made the treaty.

The principle which prevailed and controlled with respect to that particular treaty was the principle of equality of use of the canal and neutrality. There was every reason for making that principle. The principle was applicable to that condition of things. But now, by bringing in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as a support for their contention in dealing with this newer treaty, they insist that by reference in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the terms or the conditions of that former treaty were brought into the latter one.

Now, how could it be? The conditions were entirely different. Great Britain had relieved herself absolutely of any responsibility for the canal in any form whatever. She was no longer bound by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to contribute toward it in the way of protection or in any other way. She had no right to say anything about what rates should be fixed, as was done in the other instance, because she had no greater interest in the canal than any other nation. Therefore the principle which prevailed with respect to the other treaty could not apply to this one because the conditions were different. In this case the Government of the United States had under the terms of the treaty obligated itself, unless it could secure the construction of the canal by some one else, to enter upon the performance of the obligation that rested upon it and took upon itself alone and unaided the expense and the risks of constructing the canal. Nobody else had any participation in that obligation. Nobody had any right to claim anything in respect to it because of anything that another nation was doing or had promised to do. It not only did that, but it made itself liable for the future maintenance and control of the canal, and no other nation was responsible for it. Instead of providing in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as they did in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that Great Britain and the United States should fix these rates and make them reasonable and just, it was left to the United States, the owner of the canal, to fix the rates as it might believe them to be just and reasonable, and instead of giving other nations the right to participate in the canal on the condition that they should participate in its protection they are permitted by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to participate in the use of the canal upon the observance of the conditions and regulations imposed by the United States.

Mr. President, what principle in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty could be appealed to under any circumstances to support the claim of Great Britain of the right that she is insisting upon under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty? I have been unable to discover any ground upon which either of the two old treaties can be brought into this controversy in aid of the claims of the British Government. I think you will find, if you compare the several treaties, that after making the statement in the preamble that it was the intention or purpose to carry out the principles of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, they proceeded at once to do that very thing by the provisions contained in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty itself. They did not leave it to be determined by a reference to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but the parties to the new treaty set out in that treaty what their understanding was of the principles that were contained in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and you will find it embodied in the provisions of the latter treaty.

So at last this country and Great Britain must contest this question upon the face of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and nothing else.

Mr. President, I heard it remarked by a Member of this body yesterday that everything possible had been said with relation to this question, and that everything which would be said about it from this time on would be mere repetition. He made the remark that everything relating to it had been put in print so that any Senator could see it. That same Senator had this morning a resolution calling upon the State Department to furnish him the information he said he had. If I were a schoolteacher, I should ask every Senator who has studied carefully the several treaties and the diplomatic correspondence which took place between the two nations when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was under negotiations and after that treaty had been ratified to hold up his hand, and I imagine not very many hands would be raised. I think the Senator who made this statement would hide his hands under his desk.

I know Senators have investigated this matter. Some of them have investigated it very carefully. I have undertaken to do so myself. I have studied these treaties with the utmost care; I have gone back and studied the correspondence that preceded them; I have studied the Davis report that has been talked about here so much in undertaking to establish the claim of the English Government; I have studied carefully all the correspondence between the two nations with respect to the validity of the particular clause we are now asked to repeal, and I want to say, and say it in all seriousness, that I believe there is not the slightest foundation for the claim of Great Britain that we have in any way violated this treaty by any act we have done.

I want to go a little further. I want to say that the British Government has never claimed that we have violated the treaty by the passage of this statute. That claim has been made on the floor of the Senate in the interest of Great Britain by Senators representing the United States. They have out-Britished the British in the claims that they are making against their own country and in favor of that Government.

I have undertaken to prepare with some little care an analysis of the two treaties, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and the British claims, for the purpose of bringing them together to endeavor to ascertain what are the distinctive differences between the two treaties and to illustrate what I have attempted to show here, that there is absolutely no connection between the earlier treaties and the one under which we are now acting. That analysis is as follows:

CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

1. Clayton-Bulwer treaty, founded on joint protection without ownership by either Government.
   a. Provides—article 1—that neither of the contracting parties shall own or control or exercise any control over any Government or territory over which the canal may be constructed.

The effect of that was to sever these two Governments entirely from the act of constructing or managing the canal and to put them in a position where neither of them could have any superior claim on account of any territory entered or claimed by them. That provision in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was violated openly and continually by the British Government for 10 years after the treaty was made.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Is the Senator going to discuss more in detail the question of the violations to which he has referred? I think that is a very important point, and I ask the Senator whether he proposes to cover it?

Mr. WORKS. No, Mr. President. I think I shall leave that branch of it to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I was seeking information.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I am entering upon a discussion of a legal question, and I should like to make it as connected and logical as I can. It would oblige me very much for that reason if Senators would not interrupt me while I am discussing this phase of the question.

   b. Article 3 provides for joint protection by the contracting parties of whoever may construct the canal.
   c. By article 4 they agree to use their joint influence to induce some one to construct the canal.
   d. Article 5 provides for their joint protection of the canal when built, but authorizes both or either to withdraw such protection if the canal is not properly managed.
   e. Article 6 engages the contracting parties to use their efforts to induce other nations to join in the obligation of protection and share in the benefits of the use of the canal.
   f. By article 7 the obligation of help and protection is extended to any party who has already proceeded toward the construction of such a canal.
   g. Article 8—

I hope Senators will notice particularly this article in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, because it is this particular article in the treaty which, it is claimed, is brought in some mysterious way into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty upon which most of the argument is founded in an attempt to establish the claim of the British Government:

   g. Article 8 provides:
      1. That the general principle of the convention should apply to any other communications whether by canal or railway across the Isthmus which connects North and South America.
      2. That the party constructing the canal shall charge only such rates as the contracting parties shall agree upon as just and equitable.

Under that provision, as I have stated, these two Governments had a perfect right to say that they should stand upon equal terms, because they were equally obligated under this treaty for the protection of the canal in presenting an inducement to somebody to construct it, and they had determined for themselves that they would fix the amount of the rates that were to be charged and make them equitable and fair. Now, can you bring that principle into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty? The conditions are absolutely different. The rights of the parties are entirely different. There is absolutely no basis for the claim of Great Britain that she has a right on account of the newer treaty that was made to participate in any way whatever in the fixing of the rates or the determination as to whether they are just and reasonable or not.

      3. That such canal or railway shall be open to the citizens and subjects of the contracting parties on equal terms.

That is founded upon the same mutual obligation between the two Governments.

      "4. That such canal or railway should be open on like terms to citizens and subjects of other nations that shall join the United States and Great Britain in the obligation to protect the canal as provided in the treaty."

It is impossible to apply that principle to the conditions that exist under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, because the right to participate in the use of the canal does not depend upon any nation coming in and helping to protect the canal. There is no obligation to the part of the United States, morally or otherwise, to extend any privileges to any nation except upon the terms that are imposed by this Government under the Hay-

Pauncefote treaty, namely, the regulation the United States is authorized to make and impose as a condition of its use.

4. That such canal or railway should be open on like terms to citizens and subjects of other nations that shall join the United States and Great Britain in the obligation to protect the canal as provided in the treaty.

So every right to the use of the canal by the parties to the convention or any other nation was for a consideration, namely, the obligation to protect the canal, and no nation not entering into that obligation was entitled to insist upon just and equitable rates.

HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty was founded on ownership of and sovereignty over the canal by the United States.

a. This of itself was a complete abandonment of the previous treaty.

The former treaty was founded upon the joint obligation and liability of the two Governments. This one transferred all the responsibility to the Government of the United States, and therefore Great Britain was relieved of all further obligation or liability. That Government had no right left under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, because her only rights in the case depended upon what she should do under the treaty, and by the new treaty she was absolutely relieved from any and all liability with respect to the operation or maintenance of the canal or its construction. Therefore, I repeat that the mere making of this new treaty by which their relations were changed was of itself a complete abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

b. The recital in the preamble that to remove any objection to the construction of the canal by the United States without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established by the previous treaty is only the statement of a reason for making a new treaty and can not vary or modify its terms.

c. Besides, the "general principle" of neutrality declared in the first treaty was not that of neutrality of or justice to all nations, but only such as joined in the promise of protection of the canal, and therefore for a consideration.

d. This general principle is not applicable to the construction and ownership of the canal by the United States without guaranty of protection by Great Britain or any other nation.

e. The last treaty by article 1, in express terms, supersedes, and therefore abrogates, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty without excepting any of its terms or any "general principle" involved in it.

f. This treaty does not bring into it any part of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty or the treaty of 1828 affecting the Suez Canal. Both are referred to, but the principles of both as the contracting parties understood them are embodied in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Therefore, nothing is provided by reference to other treaties, but the terms of the new treaty alone control.

g. Article 2 gives the United States the right to build the canal and to regulate and manage it subject to the provisions of the present treaty, and nothing else.

It is not subject to any previous treaty, not subject to any principles that are involved in any other treaty, but it is said in plain, explicit terms that it shall be governed subject to the provisions of this particular treaty.

1. This abrogates the right of Great Britain to say what shall be "just and equitable" charges as provided in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. These rules embody the "general principles" referred to in the preamble as the contracting parties understood those principles. They were not left to reference to the old treaties or either of them, but were embodied in the new. Therefore the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is the only one to look to in determining our rights and obligations. They are:

Rule 1. a. That the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of all nations observing the rules on terms of equality.

b. There shall be no discrimination against any nation, its citizens or subjects, as to conditions or charges of traffic.

c. Such conditions or charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

This obligation to "all nations" observing the rules is, by the United States, the owner of the canal, made on condition that the rules and regulations made by this Government shall be observed by other nations using our canal. To say, under such circumstances, that "all nations" includes the nation owning the canal making the rules and regulations, and having complete ownership and control over it is absurd.

Rule 2. Provides against blockades or hostilities, but gives the United States the right to maintain military police to protect the canal against lawlessness and disorder.

Rule 3. Forbids vessels of war of a belligerent nation revictualing or taking on stores in the canal except in case of strict necessity, and provides for speedy passage through the canal.

If the words "all nations" applied to the United States, this rule would preclude this country from revictualing her own vessels of war or taking on stores, as vessels of war are included in the "all nations" clause.

Rule 4. Forbids belligerents embarking or disembarking troops or munitions of war or warlike materials in the canal.

This rule, too, as applied to the United States is absurd.

Rule 5. Includes adjacent waters within 3 miles of either end of the canal as within the rules.

Rule 6. Includes the plant establishments, buildings, and all works as part of the canal.

h. Article 4 provides that no change of territorial or international sovereignty shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under this treaty.

That the principles of neutralization mentioned in this and the former treaty did not extend to or include the matter of fixing rates or charges, but was used in the ordinary sense of the word, is apparent:

Neutral is defined as follows: "Not engaged on either side. Not taking part with or assisting either of two or more contending parties. Specifically, of a State or power lending no active assistance to either or any belligerent."

This is precisely what the United States did in this treaty; made its canal neutral as between contending belligerent nations just as it might maintain its own neutrality under like circumstances.

A belligerent is one who is carrying on war. So, the principle of neutrality applies only in this treaty when other nations are at war.

Now, mark you, one of the principles that is insisted upon by Great Britain was contained in the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—upon which they rely—is this principle of neutrality; and for the first time in the correspondence after this statute of which they are now complaining had been passed, that Government insisted that the principle of neutrality extended to the fixing of the rates, and equal treatment in the matter of rates and passage through the canal. The previous correspondence will show distinctly that they were dealing solely and exclusively with the question of neutrality in its ordinary sense; no other claim was ever made for it by the British Government.

What necessity is there, I ask the Senate, to appeal to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty for any principle of neutrality? Those principles are specifically set out in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; there is no necessity for going anywhere else. This new treaty provides exactly what the rules of neutrality shall be and the principles that shall control with respect to it. It goes further than that. It deals specifically with the question of rates and the treatment that shall be extended to other nations in the use of the canal. There is no necessity, therefore, for us to go to the earlier treaty for the purpose of determining what the rights of Great Britain, or what the rights of any other nation, are in the use of the canal, or how they shall be treated by us.

I have also made a very brief statement of what the claims of Great Britain are under this treaty in respect to the use of the canal.

The claims are:

1. Great Britain does not claim that exemption of coastwise vessels from payment of tolls is in violation of the treaty, but only—

a. That such vessesl may do other than coastwise business.

The claim of Great Britain is that by our statute we are extending this right to coastwise vessels that may do a foreign business, and thereby come in conflict with the English Government in the transaction of its business as a foreign carrier; but that does not affect the validity of the statute. The statute only extends this privilege to our coastwise trade, and no shipowner has a right to claim the benefits of it if he is engaged in foreign trade. Therefore it is a question of fact which must be determined in the future, not whether the United States has violated the treaty, but whether its vessels which are doing business have violated both the treaty and the statute which we have enacted.

b. That relieving coastwise traffic from such tolls may increase tolls on ships doing a foreign business.

That is the utmost claimed by the British Government; and I will show the Senate before I am through that it claimed only that it was necessary in fixing the rates that we should "take into account" the coastwise shipping in determining what would be a reasonable rate to be charged for the use of the canal. I shall show, further, that this is precisely what has been done in fixing the rates to be charged vessels for passing through the canal. The President, under the authority given him, has taken into account the business and the shipping of the coastwise trade, and that has been included as part of the business in determining what the rate of tolls should be. So, Mr. President, we are able to meet every claim that has been made by Great Britain by the very terms upon which they are allowed to use the canal under this treaty.

I know I am now going to weary the patience of the Senate, for I am going to take upon myself the labor of going carefully through the correspondence that took place between this Government and Great Britain in dealing with this question. I think I am justified in taking up so much of the Senate's time, because this is a great and important question about which we ought to learn everything possible there is to know before we act upon it as representatives of this Government.

Let me, before going into that, call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was twice before the Senate for ratification. When it was first presented there were a number of amendments offered to it as tending to protect the rights of our own country. Most of those amendments were defeated; but in order that you may understand the correspondence that took place, to which I am going to refer directly, it is necessary that you should understand what were the proposed amendments which were imposed upon the treaty by the Senate as tending to protect our interests. The following amendments were made in the Senate:

The first amendment is:

Insert at the end of section 5 of article 2 the following:
"It is agreed, however, that none of the immediately foregoing conditions and stipulations in sections Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of this article shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order."

That related exclusively to the question of neutrality and simply extended the right of the United States to the protection of the canal and the policing of it by its own forces.

The second amendment is:

In article 2, after the word "convention," insert the words "which convention is hereby superseded."

This was intended to abrogate the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. In the draft finally agreed upon, and which has now become the existing treaty between the two nations, that treaty was superseded, not by reference to it in parentheses but in express terms.

So that, while there was a great deal of correspondence with respect to what form they should take, both of these amendments were finally accepted by the British Government.

The third amendment is:

Strike out article 3.

Article 3 thus stricken out was as follows:

The high contracting parties will, immediately upon the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, bring it to the notice of the other powers and invite them to adhere to it.

The British Government accepted that amendment, and the reason for their doing so is perfectly apparent. It was an attempt to bring in other nations and make them practically parties to the treaty itself. The United States insisted that the control and management of the canal should be left to this Government; that it should be allowed to determine what the conditions for the use of the canal should be, and therefore that particular portion of the treaty was stricken out and does not now appear in the treaty which is in existence.

Before I go to the correspondence I want to call the attention of the Senate to an amendment which was offered but rejected by the Senate, commonly known as the Bard amendment. Strange as it may seem, after all that has been said upon the subject by Members of the Senate who were here at that time, to the effect that the Bard amendment was defeated because everybody believed it was wholly unnecessary, Members of this body still insist upon using it for the purpose of establishing against their own Government an estoppel in favor of the British Government. This is the Bard amendment:

ART. 3. The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade.

When that amendment came up it was said on all sides by the leading Members of the Senate that it was unnecessary; that it was impossible that there should be any discrimination against Great Britain or any other nation by granting free passage to our coastwise vessels, because none of the other nations of the world could participate in coastwise traffic.

My distinguished colleague [Mr. PERKINS], who, I am sorry to say, is in such condition of health that he is unable to speak upon this question, will confirm what I say when I tell the Senate that he was in close connection and was advising with Senator Bard, who was then his colleague, and that it was generally understood and accepted by Senator Bard that it was unnecessary that this amendment should be inserted in the treaty, and for that reason and for no other it was defeated.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to his colleague?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I will state to my colleague that the champion of American shipping and American navigation at that time was Senator Frye, and he took the position that my colleague has now stated; that it was unnecessary to adopt such an amendment, as the vessels of foreign nations could not participate in the coastwise trade anywhere in the United States.

Mr. WORKS. And it is suggested, Mr. President, by the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] that Senator Frye was at that time the chairman of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; he was.

Mr. WORKS. And the ranking member of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If it will not disturb the Senator, I will say the amendment of his predecessor, Senator Bard, which he is now discussing, was offered when the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was under discussion, not the second. The first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was a vastly different instrument from the second. When the second treaty came up there was apparently no amendment necessary to exempt coastwise vessels, and none was proposed or suggested or offered by any Senator. The Bard amendment was thought to be necessary in the first treaty, as the regulations were to be agreed upon by the two countries, but was thought to be wholly unnecessary in the second, as the United States was specifically authorized to make needful regulations for the government of the canal.

Now, I propose, Mr. President—I am sorry that it becomes necessary in this body—to prove by the declarations of various Senators who were here at that time and participated in the discussion which took place that what my colleague has said with respect to it is true, and that the amendment was defeated on the ground I have stated.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the gentleman from California yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Before the Senator passes from that subject—he may have stated it, but if so it escaped my attention—I desire to call attention to the difference between the original draft of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which was submitted to the Senate, and the second draft, which was finally ratified and became a binding obligation. There was another, to my mind, very significant difference. The original draft contained the language, "The high contracting parties adopt the following rules." Then it proceeded to set them out, showing the participation of Great Britain, at least to that extent, in formulating the rules; but the second draft of the treaty, as it is now in force, provides that "the United States adopts the following rules," putting the United States in the absolute control so far as the adoption of the rules is concerned.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from Utah is correct about that. I had stated that in substance, but not so clearly as the Senator has stated it, and I am obliged to him for piecing out what I have failed to say on the subject.

Now, Mr. President, I want to call attention to the declarations that have been made by various Senators who were here at that time to the effect that the Bard amendment was defeated on the ground I have stated. I quote from the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], taken from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 17, 1912. He says:

The second Hay-Pauncefote treaty, as Senators will remember, embodied in substance the amendments which the Senate had made to the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty. England had refused to accept those amendments, and then the second treaty was made embodying in principle all for which the Senate had contended.

When I reported that treaty my own impression was that it left the United States in complete control of the tolls upon its own vessels. I did not suppose then that there was any limitation put upon our right to charge such tolls as we pleased upon our own vessels, or that we were included in the phrase "all nations."

I read further from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not desire to intrude upon the Senator's time, for I know he is in a hurry. But I intended, at the close of the speech of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], to call the attention of the senior Senator from Georgia to page 4 of the views of the minority in the House report on the House bill, where the following is stated:

"With further reference to the Bard amendment, we have been granted authority to quote from a letter recently written by Senator Bard, in the course of which he states:

"'When my amendment was under consideration it was generally conceded by Senators that even without that specific provision the rules of the treaty would not prevent our Government from treating the canal as part of our coast line, and consequently could not be construed as a restriction of our interstate commerce, forbidding the discrimination in charges for tolls in favor of our coastwise trade, and this conviction contributed to the defeat of the amendment.'"

He states there that "it was generally conceded by Senators that even without that specific provision the rules of the treaty would not prevent our Government from treating the canal as part of our coast line."

Mr. O'GORMAN. That is in accord with the recollection of the Senator from Massachusetts.

* * * * * * *

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from Connecticut has anticipated what I was about to say by reading from the records a statement made by Senator Bard with respect to his amendment and the reason why it was voted down.

I simply wish to say that I have in my hand the original letter of Senator Bard making that statement—that the reason for voting down his amendment was that it was generally regarded by the Senate as unnecessary, and that that construction should be placed upon the treaty irrespective of any amendment of that kind.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. In answer to the suggestions of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], I will say that I think it was quite generally understood then that the reason for voting down the proposition to authorize the fortification in express terms was that under the treaty we had the right to fortify without that particular provision. I know I was here at the time, although I do not recall all of the speeches. But while some of us voted insisting in some instances that these things should be explicit and in others voting with the majority upon the ground that they were covered anyhow, I believe, both with reference to the coastwise trade and especially with reference to the question of fortification, that many of the votes cast against those express provisions were cast upon the theory that without them we nevertheless had the right to do them.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That the provisions were unnecessary?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; that they were unnecessary.

Senator LODGE says further:

I voted against the Bard amendment. I voted against it in the belief that it was unnecessary; that the right to fix tolls, if we built the canal or it was built under our auspices, was undoubted. I know that was the view taken by the then Senator from Minnesota, Mr. Davis, who was at that time chairman of the committee. I certainly so stated on the floor. * * * I had that same view in regard to this treaty. I was familiar with the work that was done upon it in London at the time when it was concluded there and finally agreed to, and I was very familiar with it here. Although, as the Senator from Georgia correctly said, the question was not raised at that time, I personally have never had any doubt that the matter of fixing the tolls must necessarily be within our jurisdiction; and when I referred to our going to The Hague as useless I did not mean because our case was not a good one. I meant because in the nature of things we could by no possibility have a disinterested tribunal at The Hague. It would be for the interest of every other nation involved to prevent our fixing the tolls according to our own wishes.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Massachusetts has just expressed a reason for his vote against what was known as the Bard amendment. Can the Senator inform us as to whether that was the general sentiment prevailing at that time among the Senators?

Mr. LODGE. I can only say, Mr. President, that that was the view of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and it was my view; and, while I may be mistaken, I think on that vote the majority of the Senate followed the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. As I understand, the vote was something like 27 to 43.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The question of the Bard amendment, to which the Senator refers, was brought up; and on account of its being in executive session and the debates not being available, I was unable to find any record showing what was the sentiment in that respect.

Mr. LODGE. There is no record that will show that, of course; but I know that was my opinion and the opinion of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations at the time.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, August 6, 1912.]

Mr. PERKINS. I wish to state that Senator Davis, of Minnesota, was at that time chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. He was, as is conceded by all, an authority on international law, and took the view stated by the Senator from New York and that stated by the Senator from Washington. There is no question about it, that the rules we did make were to govern other nations than ourselves.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, it seems to me it would be a great reflection upon the intelligence and patriotism of Senators who voted against those amendments to accept any different construction.

Ex-Senator Foraker:

According to my recollection, this very question (of right to discriminate in favor of our own ships was raised by an amendment offered to the treaty, which amendment was voted down overwhelmingly, because it was though unnecessary to specify that a provision of such a character did not apply to us who were building the canal, and were to have with respect to it the usual rights of ownership and all the rights of regulation.

And for the further reason that to exempt one class of ships would imply that other classes were not exempt.

Hon. Marion Butler, ex-Senator from North Carolina:

I can not agree with the position of those who contend that the "free-tolls" law is in violation of the spirit or the letter of the treaty. I remember that when the first section of the third article of the treaty was under consideration, which provides that the canal shall be open to the vessels of all nations on the same terms, that several Senators suggested the propriety of adding a provision expressly exempting our domestic commerce done through coastwise vessels.

The prompt response to this proposition on the part of the Senators having the treaty in charge was that such an amendment was unnecessary, because the treaty was so understood by the contracting parties.

Hon. George Turner, ex-Senator from Washington:

My recollection of the view taken in the Senate at the time of the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is substantially similar to that of Senators Lodge, Bard, Clapp, Perkins, Davis, and others. I am certain the treaty would not have been ratified if there had been doubt in the mind of anybody that the treaty limited the United States in the use which it might make of its own canal for its own purposes. The fact that the canal was to be the exclusive property of the United States and under its absolute control for all purposes of war and peace, subject, of course, to fair dealing as between all other nations, was the controlling factor in the ratification of the treaty. Of this there can be no doubt.

Hon. Thomas Kearns, ex-Senator from Utah:

I am in thorough accord with the views of Senators Lodge, Bard, Clapp, Perkins, Davis, and others, and, was I fortunate enough to be a Member of the Senate at the present time, I would certainly support the idea of favoring our coastwise trade. I think it is a piece of imposition on the part of Great Britain to attempt to dictate what, if anything, we should charge for canal tolls to our own war vessels, transports, or coastwise ships.

Hon. William J. Deboe, ex-Senator from Kentucky:

I remember Senator Bard's amendment to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It has always been my understanding that under that treaty the United States had the right to regulate canal tolls. My best recollection is the Bard amendment to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was defeated because Senators were of the opinion that the amendment did not confer any right that the treaty did not grant to the United States.

I have here also a letter from ex-Senator Beveridge, of Indiana, on the same subject, in which he makes the same statement. I ask to insert it in my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that course will be pursued.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 28, 1914.

Hon. JOHN I. NOLAN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. NOLAN: Answering your letter of inquiry just received, I was in the Senate when both of the Hay-Pauncefote treaties were considered. My recollection is as follows:

When the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was under discussion several Senators gave as reasons for voting against Senator Bard's amendment that it was unnecessary, because, under the treaty, even as it then stood, we had a perfect right to exempt our coastwise shipping from payment of tolls.

I voted for Senator Bard's amendment, not because I had any doubt upon the subject, but because the fullest possible American rights over the canal could not be stated too strongly for me.

When the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty came up for consideration, so unanimous was the opinion of Senators that under the treaty our right over tolls was undoubted, that Senator Bard did not even propose or offer his amendment again. Instead, he himself voted for the resolution advising the ratification of the treaty without amendment, which carried almost unanimously. The second Hay-Pauncefote treaty is the one now under consideration.

From my recollection of the matter, I think it certain that the Senate would not have advised ratification if it had been seriously contended that the treaty denied us the right to favor our own coastwise vessels.

Trusting that I have answered your question fully, I am,

Very sincerely,

ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, it is amazing to me that Members of this body, after that kind of showing, should insist that by defeating the Bard amendment their Government has estopped itself to claim the construction that we are placing upon this treaty. I have never heard a single Member of this body who was here at that time raise his voice to dispute the facts I have stated and that are confirmed by these various Senators.

The British Government has not made any such claim. That Government knew perfectly well the details of what took place. These proceedings were made public at least so far as that nation was concerned. It knew that we had defeated the Bard amendment; but that Government has never claimed, during all of the correspondence, that we were estopped by its defeat or that it militated in the least against our contention.

I have here what is entitled "A Brief History of the Amendments Proposed and Considered Since the Action of the Senate on the Former Canal Treaty with Great Britain, and Which Have Resulted in the Treaty Now Submitted."

The "treaty now submitted" was the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which is now in force. I read from this statement coming from the State Department, as follows:

The Senate's amendments to the former treaty required (first) that there should be in plain and explicit terms an express abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; (second) that the rules of neutrality adopted should not deprive the United States of the right to defend itself and to maintain public order; and (third) that other powers should not in any manner be made parties to the treaty by being invited to adhere to it.

For a better understanding of the scheme of the new treaty, it may be well briefly to advert to the objections suggested by Great Britain to these several amendments.

AS TO THE ABROGATION OF THE CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

Lord Lansdowne's objections were as to the manner of doing this and as to the substance. It was insisted that in the negotiations which led to the making of the former treaty no attempt had been made to ascertain the views of the British Government on such complete abrogation, and that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty being, as it claimed, an international compact of unquestionable validity, could not be abrogated without the consent of both parties to the contract.

There was in this connection an apparent misconception on the part of His Majesty's Government in respect to the proper function of the Senate in advising the ratification of a treaty with amendments proposed by it. It seemed to be regarded as an attempt on the part of the Senate to accomplish by its own vote, as a final act, the abrogation of an existing treaty, without an opportunity for full consideration of the matter by the other party. It was overlooked that the Senate was simply exercising its undoubted constitutional function of proposing amendments to be communicated to the other party to the contract, to ascertain its views upon the question; and it was hoped by the President—and the hope was expressed in submitting the treaty, as amended by the Senate, to the British Government—that the amendments would be found acceptable by it. Failing this, there was a full opportunity for His Majesty's Government, by counter propositions, to express its views on this and the other amendments, and so by a continuous negotiation to arrive, if possible, at a mutually satisfactory solution of all questions involved. Nevertheless, in view of the great importance of the Senate's amendments, taken together, it was deemed more expedient by Lord Lansdowne to reject them, but to leave the door open for fresh negotiations which might have a more happy issue; and he earnestly deprecated a final failure of the parties to agree, and emphatically expressed the desire of his Government to meet the views of the United States on this most important matter.

The principal substantial objection to the Senate's amendment, completely superseding the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, was that if this were done the provisions of article 1 of that treaty, which had been left untouched by the original Hay-Pauncefote treaty, would be annulled and thereby both powers would, except in the vicinity of the canal, acquire entire freedom of action in Central America, a change which Lord Lansdowne thought would certainly be of advantage to the United States and might be of substantial importance.

AS TO THE RIGHT OF THE UNITED STATES, NOTWITHSTANDING THE NEUTRAL RULES ADOPTED BY THE TREATY, TO DEFEND ITSELF BY ITS OWN FORCES, AND TO SECURE THE MAINTENANCE OF PUBLIC ORDER, COVERED BY WHAT WAS GENERALLY KNOWN AS THE DAVIS AMENDMENT.

His Majesty's Government criticized the vagueness of the language employed in the amendment, and the absence of all security as to the manner in which its ends might at some future time be interpreted, but thought that, however precisely it might be worded, it would be impossible to determine what might be the effect if one clause permitting defensive measures and another clause (which has now been omitted) prohibiting fortification of the canal were allowed to stand side by side in the same convention.

This amendment was strenuously objected to by Great Britain as involving a distinct departure from the principle of neutrality which had theretofore found acceptance by both Governments, inasmuch as it would, as construed by Lord Lansdowne, permit the United States in time of peace as well as in time of war to resort to whatever warlike acts it pleased in and near the canal, which would be clearly inconsistent with its intended neutral character and would deprive the commerce and navies of the world of the free use of it.

I want the Senate to bear in mind, while I am calling attention to these different negotiations, that never once during all of the negotiations that took place between the two Nations on this question was it claimed that the principle of neutrality was anything more than neutrality in its ordinary and accepted sense. There was no claim made that that term or that principle of neutrality extended to the rates that were to be charged.

It was insisted that by means of the amendment the obligation of Great Britain to respect the neutrality of the canal under all circumstances would remain in force, while that of the United States, on the other hand, would be essentially modified, and that this would result in a one-sided agreement, by which Great Britain would be debarred from any warlike act in or near the canal, while the United States could resort to any such acts, even in time of peace, which it might deem necessary to secure its own safety.

It will be remembered that the modification of this provision came about, and is in the treaty that is now in existence, to the effect that the Government of the United States should have the right to protect the canal by its own forces.

Moreover, it was insisted that by this amendment, in connection with the third amendment, which excluded other powers from becoming parties to the contract, Great Britain would be placed at a great disadvantage as compared with all other powers, in as much as she alone, with all her vast interests in the commerce of the world, would be bound under all circumstances to respect the neutrality of the canal, while the United States, even in time of peace, would have a treaty right to interfere with the canal on the plea of necessity for its own safety, and all other powers not being bound by the treaty could at their pleasure disregard its provisions.

AS TO THE AMENDMENT STRIKING OUT THE ARTICLE IN THE TREATY AS SUBMITTED TO THE SENATE, WHICH PROVIDED FOR AN INVITATION TO THE OTHER POWERS TO COME IN AND ADHERE TO IT.

This was emphatically objected to, because if acquiesced in by Great Britain she would be bound by what Lord Lansdowne described as the "stringent rules of neutral conduct" prescribed by the treaty, which would not be equally binding upon the other powers, and it was urged that the adhesion of other powers to the treaty as parties would furnish an additional security for the neutrality of the canal.

In the hope of reconciling the conflicting views thus presented between the former treaty as amended by the Senate and the objections thereto of the British Government, the treaty now submitted for the consideration of the Senate was drafted.

The substantial differences from the former treaty are as follows:

First. In the new draft of treaty the provision superseding the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as a whole, instead of being parenthetically inserted, as by the former Senate amendment, was made the subject of an independent article and presented as the first article of the treaty. It was thus submitted to the consideration of the British Government in connection with the other substantial provisions of the treaty which declared the neutrality of the canal for the use of all nations on terms of entire equality.

Second. By a change in the first line of article 3, instead of the United States and Great Britain jointly adopting as the basis of the neutralization of the canal, the rules of neutrality prescribed for its use as was provided by the former treaty, the United States now alone adopts them.

This was regarded as a very radical and important change and one which would go far toward a reconciliation of the conflicting views of the two Governments.

It relieves Great Britain of all responsibility and obligation to enforce the neutrality of the canal, which by the former treaty had been imposed upon or assumed by her jointly with the United States, and thus meets the main stress of the objection which seemed to underlie or be interwoven with her other objections to the former Senate amendments. The United States alone as the sole owner of the canal, as a purely American enterprise, adopts and prescribes the rules by which the use of the canal shall be regulated, and assumes the entire responsibility and burden of enforcing, without the assistance of Great Britain or of any other nation, its absolute neutrality.

It was also believed that this change would be in harmony with the national wish that this great interoceanic waterway should not only be constructed and owned, but exclusively controlled and managed, by the United States.

Third. The next important change from the former treaty consists in the omission of the words "in time of war as in time of peace" from clause 1 of article 3.

No longer insisting upon the language of the Davis amendment—which had in terms reserved to the United States express permission to disregard the rules of neutrality prescribed, when necessary to secure its own defense, which the Senate had apparently deemed necessary because of the provision in rule 1, that the canal should be free and open "in time of war as in time of peace" to the vessels of all nations—it was considered that the omission of the words "in time of war as in time of peace" would dispense with the necessity of the amendment referred to, and that war between the contracting parties, or between the United States and any other power, would have the ordinary effect of war upon treaties when not specially otherwise provided, and would remit both parties to their original and natural right of self-defense and give to the United States the clear right to close the canal against the other belligerent, and to protect it and defend itself by whatever means might be necessary.

Fourth. In conformity with the Senate's emphatic rejection of article 8 of the former treaty, which provided that the high contracting parties would, immediately upon the exchange of ratifications, bring it to the notice of other powers and invite them to adhere to it, no such provision was inserted in the draft of the new treaty.

It was believed that the declaration that the canal should be free and open to all nations on terms of entire equality (now that Great Britain was relieved of all responsibility and obligation to enforce and defend its neutrality) would practically meet the force of the objection which had been made by Lord Lansdowne to the Senate's excision of the article inviting the other powers to come in, viz, that Great Britain was placed thereby in a worse position than other nations in case of war with the United States.

The proposed draft of the new treaty was transmitted to Lord Lansdowne, and after mature deliberation he proposed on the part of His Majesty's Government only three substantial amendments.

He recognized the weighty importance of the change by which Great Britain was relieved of all responsibility for enforcing the neutrality and maintaining the security of the canal, and that all this burden was solely assumed by the United States. He also appreciated the importance of the other proposed changes in the direction of harmony.

Under this modified aspect of the relations of the two nations to the canal, he was not indisposed to consent to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty if the "general principle" of neutrality, which was reaffirmed in the preamble of the new treaty as well as of the former one, should be preserved and secured against any change of sovereignty or other change of circumstances in the territory through which the canal is intended to pass, and that the rules adopted as the basis of neutralization should govern, as far as possible, all interoceanic communication across the Isthmus. He referred in this connection to articles 1 and 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

He therefore proposed, by way of amendment, the insertion of an additional article, on the acceptance of which His Majesty's Government would be inclined to withdraw its objection to the formal abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

The amendment thus proposed by him was in the following language, viz:

"In view of the permanent character of this treaty, whereby the general principle established by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is reaffirmed, the high contracting parties hereby declare that the rules laid down in the last preceding article shall, so far as they may be applicable, govern all interoceanic communication across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and that no change of territorial sovereignty or other change of circumstances shall affect such general principle or the obligations of the high contracting parties under this treaty."

This proposed article was regarded by the President as too far-reaching for the purpose in view, and as converting the vague and indefinite provisions of the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which contemplated only future treaty stipulations when any new route should prove to be practicable, into a very definite and certain present treaty, fastening the crystallized rules of neutrality adopted now for this canal upon every other interoceanic communication across the Isthmus, and as perpetuating in a more definite and extended form, by a sort of reenactment of the eighth article, the embarrassing effects of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, of which the United States hoped to be relieved altogether.

Fifth. The next change from the former treaty is the omission of the provision in clause 7 of article 3, which prohibited the fortification of the canal, and the transfer to clause 2 of the remaining provision of clause 7, that the United States shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

The whole theory of the treaty is that the canal is to be an entirely American canal. The enormous cost of constructing it is to be borne by the United States alone. When constructed, it is to be exclusively the property of the United States and is to be managed, controlled, and defended by it. Under these circumstances, and considering that now by the new treaty Great Britain is relieved of all the responsibility and burden of maintaining its neutrality and security, it was thought entirely fair to omit the prohibition that "no fortification shall be erected commanding the canal or the waters adjacent."

Sixth. It will be observed that, although the words "in time of war as in time of peace" had been omitted from clause 1 of article 3 upon the theory that the omission of these words would dispense with the necessity of the Davis amendment, and that war between the United States and any other power would have the ordinary effect of war upon treaties and remit both parties to their natural right of self-defense—the same words are retained in the sixth clause of article 3, which provides that the plant, establishment, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed part of it for the purposes of this treaty, and "in time of war as in time of peace" shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness.

It was considered that such specific provision was in the general interest of commerce and of civilization, and that all nations would regard such a work as sacred under all circumstances.

It was hoped that the changes above enumerated from the former treaty would practically reconcile the conflicting contentions of the two Governments and would lead to the much-desired result of an entire concurrence of views between them.

With the exception of these changes care was taken in the draft of the new treaty to preserve the exact language, which had passed both the Senate and the British Government without objection, and, as is believed, without criticism.

The hope that the changes thus made had effectually met the British objections to the former treaty as amended by the Senate was almost realized.

He believed that now that a canal is about to be built at the sole cost of the United States for the equal benefit of all nations, it was sufficient for the present treaty to provide for that one canal, and that it was hardly within the range of possibility that the United States would ever build more than one canal between the two oceans.

The President was, however, not only willing but desirous that the "general principle" of neutralization referred to in the preamble of this treaty should be applicable to this canal now intended to be built, notwithstanding any change of sovereignty or of international relations of the territory through which it should pass. This "general principle" of neutralization had always, in fact, been insisted upon by the United States, and he recognized the entire justice of the request of Great Britain that if she should now surrender the material interest which had been secured to her by the first article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which might result in the indefinite future should the territory traversed by the canal undergo a change of sovereignty, this "general principle" should not be thereby affected or impaired.

These views were communicated to His Majesty's Government, and as a substitute for the article proposed by Lord Lansdowne the following was proposed on the part of the United States:

"It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligations of the high contracting parties under the present treaty."

Upon a full exchange of views, this article proposed by the United States was accepted by Great Britain and becomes article 4 of the treaty now submitted. It is thought to do entire justice to the reasonable demands of Great Britain in preserving the general principle of neutralization and at the same time to relieve the United States of the vague, indefinite, and embarrassing obligations imposed by the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

During the discussions upon this article it was suggested that, although no particular route was mentioned in the proposed treaty as the route to be traversed by the canal, yet as the canal had been so commonly mentioned as the "Nicaragua Canal" and the intended treaty as the "Nicaragua Canal treaty," it might possibly be claimed that the treaty did not apply to a canal by the Panama route or by any other possible route. But it had always been intended by the President that the treaty should apply to the canal which should be first constructed, by whichever or whatever route, and to remove the apprehension referred to and to exclude all possible doubt in the matter it was agreed that the preamble should be amended by inserting in the preamble, after the word "oceans," the words "by whatever route may be considered expedient."

His Majesty's Government at first strenuously objected to the absence from the treaty of any provision for other powers coming in, so as to be bound by its terms. It protested against being bound by what it regarded as stringent rules of neutrality which should not be equally binding upon other powers.

Lord Lansdowne accordingly proposed the following amendment, viz:

"To insert in rule 1 of article 3, after the word 'nation,' the words 'which shall agree to observe these rules,' and in the following line, after the word 'nation,' the words 'so agreeing,' so as to make the clause read:

"'1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations which shall agree to observe these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation so agreeing,' etc."

The President, however, could not consent to this amendment, because he aprehended that it might be construed as making the other powers parties to the contract and as giving them contract rights in the canal, and that it should thus practically restore to the treaty the substance of the provision which the Senate had struck out as article 3 of the former treaty. He believed also that there was a strong national feeling against giving to the other powers anything in the nature of a contract right in an affair so peculiarly American as the canal; that no other powers had now any right in the premises or anything to give up or part with as consideration for acquiring such a contract right; that they are to rely on the good faith of the United States in its declaration to Great Britain in this treaty; and that it adopts the rules and principles of neutralization there set forth. These rules are adopted in the treaty with Great Britain as a consideration for getting rid of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and the only way in which other nations are bound by them is that they must comply with them if they would use the canal.

It was also apparent that the proposed amendment, if accepted, would make rule 1 more objectionable than the third article of the former treaty, which was stricken out by the Senate's amendment, for that only invited other powers to come in and become parties to the contract after ratification, whereas the proposed provision would rather compel other powers to come in and become parties to the contract in the first instance as a condition precedent to the use of the canal by them.

Upon due consideration of these suggestions, and at the same time to put all the powers upon the same footing, viz, that they could use the canal only by complying with the rules of neutrality adopted and prescribed, an amendment to Lord Lansdowne's amendment was proposed and agreed upon, viz:

"To strike out from his amendment the words 'which shall agree to observe' and substitute therefor the word 'observing,' and, in the next line, to strike out the words 'so agreeing' and to insert before the word 'nation' the word 'such.'"

This made the clause as finally agreed upon and found in the treaty as now submitted for the consideration of the Senate:

"The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation," and so forth.

Thus the whole idea of contract right in the other powers is eliminated, and the vessels of any nation which shall refuse or fail to observe the rules adopted and prescribed may be deprived of the use of the canal.

One other amendment proposed by Lord Lansdowne was regarded by the President as so entirely reasonable that it was agreed to without discussion. This was the insertion, at the end of clause 1 of article 3, the words: "Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable," and the word "convention," wherever it occurs, has been changed to "treaty."

It is believed that this memorandum will put the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations in full possession of the history of all changes in the treaty since the action of the Senate on the former amendment.

I think it will be seen, Mr. President, that really the only matter of controversy between the two Governments in dealing with the question was the simple one of neutrality, and that alone. In order to show what the view of the British Government was, not from the mere statement of our own representatives but from what has been said by Lord Lansdowne himself in connection with it, I will read some extracts from letters that were exchanged between Lord Lansdowne and others.

I will read, first, some extracts from a letter from Lord Lansdowne to Lord Pauncefote, in which he says:

On the 21st of January your lordship reported that a bill, originally introduced in 1899, had been laid before Congress, empowering the President to acquire from the Republics of Costa Rica and Nicaragua the control of such portion of territory as might be desirable or necessary, and to direct the Secretary of War, when such control had been secured, to construct the canal and make such provisions for defense as might be required for the safety and protection of the canal and the terminal harbors.

It was probable that the bill would be passed, and it was clear that additional embarrassment would be caused by an enactment opposed to the terms of the proposed convention, and in direct violation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. On the other hand, your lordship's information led to the confident expectation that the convention as signed would, if agreed to by Her Majesty's Government, be ratified by the Senate.

In these circumstances Her Majesty's Government consented to reopen the question, and, after due consideration, determined to accept the convention unconditionally, as a signal proof of their friendly disposition and of their desire not to impede the execution of a project declared to be of national importance to the people of the United States.

Your excellency stated that the United States Government expressed satisfaction at this happy result and appreciation of the conciliatory disposition shown by Her Majesty's Government.

The convention was forthwith submitted to the Senate for ratification, and on the 9th of March the committee charged with its examination reported in favor of ratification, with the insertion, subsequently adopted, after section 5 of article 2, of a paragraph containing provision that the rules laid down in the preceding sections should not apply to measures for the defense of the United States by its own forces and the maintenance of public order. This alteration was discussed by the Senate in secret session on the 5th of April, but no vote was taken upon it nor upon the direct question of ratification.

The bill empowering the President to construct and provide for the defense of the canal passed the House of Representatives by a large majority on the 2d of May. The Senate, however, postponed consideration of the bill, although favorably reported by the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

After the recess, during which the presidential election took place, the discussion was resumed in the Senate. On the 20th of December the vote was taken, and resulted in the ratification of the convention with the three amendments which have been presented for the acceptance of His Majesty's Government.

The first of these amendments, that in article 2, declares the Clayton-Bulwer treaty to be "hereby superseded."

Before attempting to consider the manner in which this amendment will, if adopted, affect the parties to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, I desire to call your excellency's attention to a question of principle which is involved by the action of the Senate at this point.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty is an international contract of unquestionable validity, a contract which, according to well-established international usage, ought not to be abrogated or modified, save with the consent of both the parties to the contract. In spite of this usage, His Majesty's Government find themselves confronted by a proposal communicated to them by the United States Government, without any previous attempt to ascertain their views, for the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

A misunderstanding seemed to exist in the mind of Lord Lansdowne, which you will remember is noticed by the Secretary of State in commenting on this matter. We were not attempting on our own part to amend the treaty, but were simply exercising the right of the Senate to propose amendments to be submitted to the British Government. He says further:

The practical effect of the amendment can best be understood by reference to the inclosed copy of the articles of the treaty, Nos. 1 and 6, which, assuming that the United States Government would undertake all the obligations imposed by article 4 of the treaty, contain the only provisions not replaced by new provisions, covering the same ground, in the convention.

Under article 1 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty the two powers agreed that neither would occupy or fortify or colonize, or assume or exercise any dominion over any part of Central America, nor attain any of the foregoing objects by protection afforded to or alliance with any State or people of Central America. There is no similar agreement in the convention. If, therefore, the treaty were wholly abrogated, both powers would, except in the vicinity of the canal, recover entire freedom of action in Central America. The change would certainly be of advantage to the United States, and might be of substantial importance.

Under the other surviving portion of the treaty (part of article 6) provision is made for treaties with the Central American States in furtherance of the object of the two powers and for the exercise of good offices should differences arise as to the territory through which the canal will pass. In this case abrogation would perhaps signify but little to this country. There is nothing in the convention to prevent Great Britain from entering into communication, or exercising good offices, with the Central American States, should difficulties hereafter arise between them and the United States.

The other two amendments present more formidable difficulties.

The first of them, which reserves to the United States the right of taking any measures which it may find necessary to secure by its own forces the defense of the United States, appears to His Majesty's Government to involve a distinct departure from the principle which has until now found acceptance with both Governments—the principle, namely, that in time of war as well as in time of peace the passage of the canal is to remain free and unimpeded, and is to be so maintained by the power or powers responsible for its control.

Were this amendment added to the convention the United States would, it is presumed, be within their rights, if at any moment when it seemed to them that their safety required it, in view of warlike preparations not yet commenced, but contemplated or supposed to be contemplated by another power, they resorted to warlike acts in or near the canal—acts clearly inconsistent with the neutral character which it has always been sought to give it, and which would deny the free use of it to the commerce and navies of the world.

The situation which would be created by the addition of the new clause is deserving of serious attention. If it were to be added, the obligation to respect the neutrality of the canal in all circumstances would, so far as Great Britain is concerned, remain in force; the obligation of the United States, on the other hand, would be essentially modified. The result would be a one-sided arrangement under which Great Britain would be debarred from any warlike action in or around the canal, while the United States would be able to resort to such action to whatever extent they might deem necessary to secure their own safety.

It may be contended that if the new clause were adopted, section 7 of article 2, which prohibits the erection of fortifications, would sufficiently insure the free use of the canal. This contention is, however, one which His Majesty's Government are quite unable to admit. I will not insist upon the dangerous vagueness of the language employed in the amendment, or upon the absence of all security as to the manner in which the words might, at some future time, be interpreted. For even if it were more precisely worded, it would be impossible to determine what might be the effect if one clause permitting defensive measures, and another forbidding fortifications, were allowed to stand side by side in the convention. To His Majesty's Government it seems, as I have already said, that the amendment might be construed as leaving it open to the United States at any moment, not only if war existed, but even if it were anticipated, to take any measures, however stringent or far-reaching, which, in their own judgment, might be represented as suitable for the purpose of protecting their national interests. Such an enactment would strike at the very root of that "general principle" of neutralization upon which the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was based, and which was reaffirmed in the convention as drafted.

I wish to call attention to the fact that throughout this entire correspondence it is not claimed by the British Government that any principle which is supposed to have been contained in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is adopted in this treaty, but every reference to it made by Great Britain and by our own Government is to the effect that the principle is carried into the new treaty, as I insisted in the beginning.

But the import of the amendment stands out in stronger relief when the third proposal is considered. This strikes out article 3 of the convention, under which the high contracting parties engaged, immediately upon the convention being ratified, to bring it to the notice of other powers and to invite their adherence. If that adherence were given, the neutrality of the canal would be secured by the whole of the adhering powers. Without that adherence it would depend only upon the guaranty of the two contracting powers. The amendment, however, not only removes all prospect of the wider guaranty, but places this country in a position of marked disadvantage, compared with other powers which would not be subject to the self-denying ordinance which Great Britain is desired to accept. It would follow, were His Majesty's Government to agree to such an arrangement, that while the United States would have a treaty right to interfere with the canal in time of war, or apprehended war, and while other powers could with a clear conscience disregard any of the restrictions imposed by the convention, Great Britain alone, in spite of her enormous possessions on the American Continent, in spite of the extent of her Australasian colonies and her interests in the East, would be absolutely precluded from resorting to any such action or from taking measures to secure her interests in and near the canal.

Mr. President, I think it is perfectly evident from this whole correspondence that the British Government was contending for one thing and one only with respect to the provisions that should be inserted in the treaty and the amendments which were proposed to be made, and that was the principle of neutrality in its ordinary sense; and it was conceded by the British Government throughout that this question of neutrality was to be covered not by anything which appeared in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but it was to be determined by the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which they were negotiating about. That treaty was made to satisfy both Governments with respect to any principle that might affect the relations between the parties in the future.

There is another significant fact respecting this correspondence, not on account of what it contains but on account of what is omitted. It has been argued here very strenuously that we are obligated to the British Government to allow it what it claims, because by giving up the Clayton-Bulwer treaty it surrendered the right which existed before to own land over which the canal might pass and thereby obtain for itself and hold control of the situation. Do you find any claim of that kind made by the British Government? Has it made any claim throughout all this correspondence that it has given up anything that is of value to it or that the Government of the United States was under obligation to it, morally or otherwise, because of anything that it had given up? Not at all. That is another position which is taken by Members of this body that never was taken by the British Government.

THE DAVIS REPORT.

Now, I come to another phase of this question that has been commented upon in connection with that very claim which was made, and that is what is known as the Davis report. It is contended that the Davis report shows that certain rights existed on the part of the British Government by virtue of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and that we were anxious to secure this new treaty in order to relieve ourselves from the right the British Government had to deal with this question of constructing the canal and controlling it after it was constructed.

It should be a sufficient answer to this contention that the British Government voluntarily surrendered all its rights under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and that it has made no claim under it since, and this claim made by Senators in this body against our own Government is a claim that the British Government has never made.

The Davis report is an able argument in favor of the enactment of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. One of the principal objects of it is to magnify the condition that existed detrimental to this country under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, endeavoring to induce this Government to enter into a new treaty because of the obligations of the old one. I think the distinguished Senator from Minnesota, in making this report, has made out a good deal stronger case for the British Government than was justified or that could be maintained by that Government itself.

I think it is only fair in the discussion of this question to lay before the Senate the arguments which were made by Senator Davis, then chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, upon which our opponents in this discussion so much rely. I shall trespass further upon the patience of the Senate by calling attention to that report and reading somewhat extensively from it in showing what was the attitude of the Committee on Foreign Relations at that time. It is very largely a history of the various canals and canal treaties and the relations of the different Governments toward the canal. He says, for example:

Shortly afterwards Mr. Squire negotiated a treaty of like import with Honduras, which was suppressed by the United States to make way for the Clayton-Bulwer negotiation. Nevertheless, Mr. Clayton held these treaties in the State Department and made use of them as a means of inducing the British Government to negotiate the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

In a letter to Mr. Clayton, dated September 25, 1849, Mr. Rives, our minister to France, states an interview he had with Lord Palmerston, in which he said "that there was one question which, unless great prudence and caution were observed on both sides, might involve the two Governments, unwittingly, in collision."

That question was the support given by Great Britain to the claim of "ownership and sovereign jurisdiction by the Mosquito Indians of the mouth and lower part of the river San Juan de Nicaragua." He said that "the United States were necessarily parties to this question in their own right.

"That citizens of the United States had entered into contract with Nicaragua to open a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the river San Juan and the Nicaragua Lake.

"That the Government of the United States, after most careful examination of the subject, had come undoubtedly to the conclusion that upon both legal and historical grounds the State of Nicaragua was the true territorial sovereign of the river San Juan as well as of Nicaragua Lake, and that it was therefore bound to give its countenance and support by all proper and reasonable means to rights lawfully derived by their citizens under a grant from that sovereign.

"* * * That the United States sought no exclusive privilege or preferential right of any kind in regard to the proposed communication, and their sincere wish, if it should be found practicable, was to see it dedicated to the common use of all nations on the most liberal terms and a footing of perfect equality for all."

That language is dwelt upon by those who are insisting we have violated the principle that controlled the negotiations in the making of the treaty between the two nations; that we were then insising the canal should be kept free and open to all nations on terms of equality. We have never denied that. The treaty under consideration here provides for it in express terms. There never has been any disposition on the part of the Government of the United States to exclude other nations from the use of the canal, and the only condition which was imposed upon other nations in using the canal under the treaty which is now in existence is that they shall observe the rules and regulations laid down by the United States.

That the United States would not, if they could, obtain any exclusive right or privilege in a great highway which naturally belonged to all mankind.

That while they aimed at no exclusive privilege for themselves, they could never consent to see so important a communication fall under the exclusive control of any other great commercial power.

We thus initiated and explained our fixed policy as to a canal through the Isthmus of Darien.

Again he says:

This paper—

Referring to the one that he has mentioned—

This paper was submitted to the British Government.

It was an explicit and peremptory demand for an agreement that would give to Nicaragua the freedom of exit to the sea through the San Juan River for a ship canal that should be open to all nations on equal terms and protected by an agreement of perfect neutrality.

In the origin of our claim to the right of way for our people and our produce, armies, mails, and other property through a canal which our citizens had contracted with Nicaragua to build, we offered to dedicate the canal to the equal use of mankind. We offered to make it neutral ground, and denied to our Government the exclusive right to use and control it.

We went further and, with a treaty in our hands in which Nicaragua had granted us exclusive rights and powers for building and owning a canal, we refused to ratify it, but laid it before Great Britain as an argument to induce that Government to withdraw her protectorate over the Mosquito Indians, who then claimed to hold the mouth of the San Juan de Nicaragua in lawful and independent sovereignty under the protection of Great Britain.

As to neutrality and the exclusive control of the canal and its dedication to universal use, the suggestions that were incorporated in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty came from the United States and were concurred in by Great Britain.

In no instance has the Government of the United States intimated an objection to this treaty on account of the features of neutrality and its equal and impartial use by all other nations. Nor has this Government ever proposed to Great Britain to cancel, amend, or annul the entire treaty or any separate part of it until the present negotiation, which resulted in the convention now before the committee for consideration.

It should be borne in mind now that this report is made upon the first proposed Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and not the last one, that was signed and became effective.

The earliest declaration against the exclusive military control of an isthmian canal was made by Mr. Cass, August 24, 1857. Replying to a letter of Lord Napier, which suggested the plan of a joint protectorate of any transoceanic canal through the Isthmus of Darien by Great Britain, France, and the United States, Mr. Cass said:

"It is important that they (the canals) should be kept free from the danger of interruption by the governments through whose territories they pass, or by hostile operations of other countries engaged in war.

"While the rights of sovereignty of the local governments must always be respected, other rights also have arisen in the progress of events involving interests of great magnitude to the commercial world, and demanding its careful attention and, if need be, its efficient protection.

"In view of these interests and after having invited capital and enterprise from other countries to aid in the opening of these great highways of nations, under pledges of free transit to all desiring it, it can not be permitted that these Governments should exercise over them (the canals) arbitrary and unlimited control, and close them or embarrass them without reference to the wants of commerce or the intercourse of the world.

"Equally disastrous would it be to leave them at the mercy of every nation which, in time of war, might find it advantageous for hostile purposes, to take possession of them, and either restrain their use or suspend it altogether."

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson	Perkins	Sutherland
Borah	Jones	Pittman	Thomas
Brady	Kenyon	Poindexter	Thompson
Bristow	Kern	Ransdell	Thornton
Bryan	Lodge	Robinson	Vardaman
Burton	Martin, Va.	Saulsbury	Walsh
Chamberlain	Martine, N. J.	Shafroth	Warren
Clark, Wyo.	Nelson	Sheppard	Weeks
Crawford	Norris	Sherman	West
Fall	O'Gorman	Simmons	Williams
Gallinger	Oliver	Smith, Ga.	Works.
Gronna	Overman	Smith, Mich.
Hitchcock	Page	Smoot

Mr. PAGE. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE], and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] are absent upon official business of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. My colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is unavoidably absent on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. WORKS. I understand that there was a unanimous-consent agreement to go into executive session at 4 o'clock to-day. If that be so, I am quite willing to suspend what I am saying at this time with notice that I shall continue my remarks to-morrow morning immediately after the conclusion of the morning business.

ISSUE OF PATENTS TO PUBLIC LANDS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 474) to authorize the issuance of absolute and unqualified patents to public lands in certain cases, which were, in line 10, to strike out all after "patents" down to and including "noncoal," line 13, and insert "without such reservation," and to amend the title so as to read: "An act to authorize the issuance of unqualified patents to public lands in certain cases."

Mr. GRONNA. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12235) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, and for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. BRYAN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. BRYAN, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, and Mr. PERKINS conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

H. R. 11254. An act to increase the limit of cost for the erection and completion of the United States post-office building at Mandan, N. Dak.;

H. R. 11747. An act to increase the limit of cost for the purchase of a site and the construction of a public building in Memphis, Tenn.;

H. R. 13296. An act for the enlargement, etc., of the Wall Street front of the assay office in the city of New York;

H. R. 13415. An act to increase the limit of cost of public building at Shelbyville, Tenn.; and

H. R. 13819. An act to increase the limit of cost of Federal building at Pendleton, Oreg.

H. R. 4988. An act to provide for the disposal of certain lands in the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, N. Dak., was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

H. R. 13985. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Baton Rogue, La., was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CARIBOU NATIONAL FOREST RESERVE.

The bill (H. R. 4544) to reserve certain lands and to incorporate the same and make them a part of the Caribou National Forest Reserve was read twice by its title.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, on March 12 the Senate passed, with a very slight amendment, a bill similar to this one. Instead of passing the Senate bill the House has passed their bill on the same subject and sent it over to us. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the House bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr, President, there is unfinished business which was temporarily laid aside, its consideration to be resumed at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS], but I understand unanimous consent has been given to go into executive session this afternoon. I therefore ask that the unfinished business may be again temporarily laid aside. Then I will yield to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and after that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] can move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside.

Mr. BORAH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4544) to reserve certain lands and to incorporate the same and make them a part of the Caribou National Park Reserve.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BORAH. I enter a motion to reconsider the votes by which the bill (S. 1739) to reserve certain lands and to incorporate the same and make them a part of the Caribou National Park Reserve was ordered to a third reading and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

Mr. BORAH. I move that the Secretary request the House of Representatives to return the bill to the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, April 8, 1914, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 7, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, infinite Spirit, our heavenly Father, that under Thee we are the architect of our own fortune, a stupendous responsibility yet a precious boon we would not relinquish. To think, to will, to act, to carve out our own destiny, is glorious beyond compare. Yet, O Father, forsake us not lest we forget that without Thee we could not think, we could not choose, we could not act. Uphold, sustain, and guide us that we may choose to work in Thee, with Thee, for Thee, and build for ourselves a character which will redound to our everlasting good under the leadership of the world's great Exemplar. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make an inquiry about the RECORD. In the filing of petitions, as you will note on page 6314, two methods are followed. I want to inquire in regard to the practice in backing petitions and their entry in the RECORD. The Speaker will notice that in some instances the petition filed is specific; that is, a petition is recorded as coming from the people of a certain section of the State. In other instances, the petitions are grouped, as, for instance, "A petition of sundry citizens of Kansas, favoring national prohibition; referred to the Committee on the Judiciary." Now, yesterday I filed a number of such petitions separately. Is it the practice of the House to bunch separate petitions and include them under one head for printing in the RECORD, or are entries of them printed separately? What is the custom? I do not know, and therefore I am inquiring.

The SPEAKER. The custom is, as followed by the bill clerk as to petitions, that if a Member writes on the back of a petition what he wants done with it, it goes. It is not like a bill. Sometimes they file them by request and sometimes they do not. Now, the right of petition, of course, was settled in the days of John Quincy Adams so that it will never be overthrown.

Mr. MURDOCK. My inquiry does not go to that. I understand that; but is a separate entry made in the RECORD of each separate petition filed?

The SPEAKER. Each separate petition filed?

Mr. MURDOCK. Is a separate entry made in the RECORD? That is the nature of my inquiry.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The Speaker has never paid any particular attention to that——

Mr. MURDOCK. I never have, either. I never discovered it until this morning.

The SPEAKER (continuing). Except so far as it affects him. Now, the rule is, if somebody sends a petition from my home district, I file it just like any other Member would and write across it, "Mr. CLARK of Missouri"; but if somebody sends me a petition from outside I do not care about, in my official capacity, I file it "By the Speaker, by request, under the rule."

Mr. MURDOCK. If the Speaker should receive several petitions from Missouri—say, one from Jackson County and one from Pike County—ought those petitions to be recorded separately in the RECORD if they are on the same subject?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is rather inclined to think they ought to be. But that is just simply a private opinion.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, suppose a Member of the House should take the trouble to file a thousand separate petitions from a thousand separate individuals on the same subject, it never has been the practice to insert those petitions by title separately, but it has been the practice to say that the Member filing them filed petitions relating to a certain subject, which were referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is what I wanted to know. Then when a Member does file petitions, it is simply necessary to back one of the petitions. I went to the trouble of backing six or seven petitions to no purpose.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman desires to have them appear separately, he might have filed them on separate days.

Mr. MURDOCK. Which would have been a subterfuge, of which I am not guilty.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the decision of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is correct. The old Members here will remember on one occasion—the Chair forgets what it was about—when there were trundled into the House petitions claimed to be signed by hundreds of thousands of people.

Mr. MURDOCK. That was by Gen. SHERWOOD, of Ohio.

The SPEAKER. I do not know who it was or what it was about. But I think on the parcel-post question they came in here by the ton. The Chair thinks the position of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is right.

Mr. MURDOCK. So, Mr. Speaker, if you want petitions entered separately you must file one on each day rather than all in a bundle?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. Surely.

Mr. BARNHART. I have had experience in filing petitions where I set forth on a slip on the back of a stack of them that they were petitions from residents of the different cities in my district or in my State, and it always appears so in the RECORD. If the gentleman from Kansas will indicate on a slip on the back of his petitions that they are from citizens of this city, that city, or the other city, and so forth, it will appear in the RECORD.

Mr. MURDOCK. If the gentleman will try it to-morrow morning, he will find it will not work out that way.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. [Laughter.]

FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to present resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of the citizens of New Orleans on Saturday night last, protesting against the location of the Federal reserve banks, and ask that they may be read by the Clerk, which will take about seven minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ] asks unanimous consent that certain resolutions passed in New Orleans as to the location of regional banks be read by the Clerk. Is there objection?

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I ask, then, unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes, so that I may read these resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent——

Mr. DUPRÉ. And in that connection I will say that I do not occupy the time of this House very much, and this matter is very vital to the people whom I have the honor of representing, and I am specially charged by the chairman of that mass meeting and through numerous telegrams to ask to have these resolutions read on the floor of the House. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] to accord to me that courtesy, which I would be glad to accord to him under similar circumstances.

Mr. GORDON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I have read those resolutions, and they pertain wholly to the executive department of this Government.

Mr. MANN. I ask for the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is to put that request. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ] asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes, in order that he may read these resolutions. Is there objection?

Mr. GORDON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] objects, and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] is recognized.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The gentleman from Ohio received a regional bank for Cleveland, did he not?

Mr. GORDON. No, sir; I never asked for one.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15279, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15279, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, with Mr. GARNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15279) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, on Saturday we passed over lines 9 to 13, inclusive, on page 32. I ask that the Chair now rule on the point of order. I hold in my hand the original order of President Taft, dated March 28, 1912, providing for the publication of the books of the same purport as those to which reference was made on Saturday.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has examined the matter and has a copy of that order, and is of the opinion that the point of order is not well taken, and overrules the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on line 10, page 32, by striking out the word "twentieth" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "twenty-eighth."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. That is merely a typographical error in the date. It ought to be "twenty-eighth" instead of "twentieth."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 32, line 10, strike out the word "twentieth" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty-eighth."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose on Saturday we were on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] to strike out, on page 35, line 9, the sum "$1,400" and insert "$1,600."

Mr. FOWLER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] is recognized.

Mr. FOWLER. On page 35, line 9, is the provision for the chief engineer of the Treasury Department at a salary of $1,400. The statute provides for a salary of $1,600. I desire to call to the attention of the House the fact that the chief engineer is a laboring man. I have offered this amendment in order to restore the statutory salary—not to increase his salary, but to make it conform to the plain provision of permanent law.

Mr. Chairman, I make this appeal in behalf of labor; I make this appeal because I believe that the honorable committee, when it brought in this bill, was laboring under the belief that this was the salary provided by law. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that there will not be a Member here on the floor of this House who stands for labor and fair treatment to labor who will vote against this amendment.

Now, I do not desire to pose as a better friend of labor than any other man on the floor of this House——

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FOWLER. In a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not decline to yield, Mr. Chairman. I will yield to the gentleman in a moment.

I know, Mr. Chairman, what it is to labor, and I know something about the hardships of laboring men. Labor has been compelled to fight for its rights, and every step of progress which it has made is marked by persistent effort on its part against the combined opposition of the rich; and whenever there is an inequality or a wrong done to labor in any bill that is brought in on the floor of this House, I regard it as my duty to stand for evening up that inequality and giving to labor its just rights. The statute makes a provision for $1,600.

Now I yield to my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. No; he is gone, as I understand.

Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to take up any further time of the House, and I appeal to the members of this Committee on Appropriations and to the members of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of righting this wrong and giving to this laboring man his just reward, as the statute provides.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, on March 3, 1875, this salary was fixed at $1,600.

Mr. MANN. When was that, may I ask the gentleman?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. On March 3, 1875, the salary of the chief engineer of the Treasury Department was fixed at $1,600.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman how it was fixed?

Mr. FOWLER. It was fixed by regular statute.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. By a statute reorganizing the Treasury Department. In 1873 or thereabouts gentlemen will remember that there was a bill passed increasing the salaries, called the "salary grab." The next Congress repealed that law. In 1875 another statute was passed reorganizing the Treasury Department, and in that act the salary of the chief engineer was fixed at $1,600.

Mr. MANN. Was that a legislative act?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes; an act of legislation attached to an appropriation bill, I think. In 1876, Mr. Chairman, Congress appropriated $1,400, and every year since the position has been appropriated for at $1,400.

The Committee on Appropriations in making up this bill did not have it called to its attention that the law at any time had provided for a larger salary. There was nothing in the estimates submitted to this committee asking for any larger salary. There was not a word of testimony offered in the hearings that requested a larger salary or that would justify the committee in bringing in a recommendation for a larger salary. This House has absolutely no information as to the character of the work or the worth of the man who is filling the office.

I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the chief engineer in the Treasury Department has charge of the heating plant only. In the State, War, and Navy Building the chief engineer has charge of the heating plant and the lighting plant, and that plant not only heats that building, but also heats and lights the White House and the Mills Building, and yet the salary of the chief engineer at the State, War, and Navy Building is appropriated for at $1,400.

The engineer in the Post Office Department, who holds as responsible a position as the one we are now legislating about, is paid $1,400 a year. The engineer in the District Building is paid $1,400. All these buildings contain heating, lighting, and power plants. The engineer in the Department of Justice receives a salary of only $1,200. The engineer in the annex to the Navy Department receives a salary of $1,200. The engineer in the Commerce Building, one of the largest buildings occupied for offices in the city, receives a salary of only $1,000. The engineer in the building occupied by the Department of Labor receives a salary of only $1,000. Now, I submit to the committee that in view of the fact that the Treasury Department has brought nothing to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations, we have no justification for increasing the salary.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, just to test how many Members stand for labor, I demand a rising vote.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 4, noes 24.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, on page 35, line 7, there is a provision in the bill for $1,200 for a storekeeper. The statute provides for a salary of $1,400. This is a small-salaried office, requiring a man to do a great deal of menial labor. Just why his salary was cut $200 I have not been able to understand; but it is a fact that these low-salaried men, who are laboring men and who have their salaries fixed by permanent law, have had their salaries cut by some means unknown to me.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman surely does not class this as a laborer's position in the sense in which he uses the term. This man is a clerk, who has charge of and keeps account of the towels, soap, and things of that sort for the use of the Treasury Department. He is a clerk down there.

Mr. FOWLER. Oh, yes; but, Mr. Chairman, this man does menial service. He would not be receiving $1,200 a year if he did not do menial service.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman knows that there are hundreds of clerks in the departments here who get only $900 and $1,000 each.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; and they do menial service. All of the low-salaried men do menial service, but the high-salaried men wear standing collars, sparkling diamonds, kid gloves, and ride in cabs.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Does the gentleman know who holds this position?

Mr. FOWLER. No; I do not know him at all. If I ever saw him I do not know it, but I stand for him the same as if he were my brother; indeed, he is my brother, because I have labored in the same capacity that he is laboring. And so I stand for him here, and ask you and appeal to your fairness as a committee to restore his salary to that which is fixed by the law. Pause and think before cutting down these low salaries. Give these men an opportunity in the race of life for the good things in this world, so that when they lie down in death they will not have to say that they were deprived of an equal chance in this world with their fellow men.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] should not flatter himself that he is the only member of the committee, or of the House, who is the friend of labor.

Mr. FOWLER. Oh, I said that I did not.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am happy to know that labor has many friends on this floor. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, this particular position to which the gentleman refers is not of the class to which he evidently thinks it belongs. This is a storekeeper, a man who performs clerical services, keeping account of the towels, soap, and other necessary articles for use in the Treasury Department. The gentleman says that the committee is seeking to cut this man's salary down. I want to say to the gentleman that this man's salary has been just what it is in this bill since 1876, for nearly 40 years, and no one connected with the Treasury Department has undertaken to submit any estimate asking that it be increased. There was no request submitted to the committee asking that it be increased over what it is now, and so far as the committee knows the man who holds the position, and who probably has held it for some time at this salary, is more than willing to hold it at the present salary. The gentleman has been a Member of this House for three or four years——

Mr. FOWLER. No; this is my second term.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman has been here three years, and yet never before has he risen upon his feet to ask that this salary be increased, or that the salary of the chief engineer, to which he alluded a few moments ago, be increased.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I did not think that the committee would abuse these low-salaried men by cutting them down.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman has no right to make any such remark as that, because if he knows anything about the salaries carried in this bill he knows that his remark is not borne out by the facts. I have just stated that this position of storekeeper has paid $1,200 since 1876, and the gentleman should not put himself in the attitude of trying to leave the impression that the committee are undertaking to cut down this salary, or any other small salary in the bill.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. If this salary has been fixed by law for 40 years, is it not about time that there was an increase made in it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think he knows more about what this salary ought to be than the Secretary of the Treasury or the officials in the Treasury Department who are familiar with his services, who know exactly what he has to do in carrying out his duties? They have submitted no request or estimate asking that his salary be increased.

Mr. FOWLER. I know something about what it costs to live.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Nor has the man himself requested that his salary be increased.

Mr. FOWLER. He is afraid to.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, no. The gentleman ought not to make that remark.

Mr. FOWLER. He would be afraid of losing his position if he did.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Of course it is very evident why the gentleman gets on his feet so often and undertakes to attack the committee by insinuation or intimation that they are undertaking to reduce these salaries which are paid to men who do not receive the higher salaries; but the committee have acted fairly in these matters. They have not sought to increase any salary which was not estimated for, and there is no salary in this bill, whether high or low, that has been increased unless estimates were submitted to Congress asking for an increase and reasons given and shown why the salary should be increased. Neither has any salary in this bill been reduced, except two high-salaried positions in the Post Office Department paying $5,000 and $3,500, respectively.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division, to see who stands for labor.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 1, noes 22.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, on page 35, line 14, there is a provision carried in the bill for two lieutenants of the watch. I move to strike out the figures "900" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "1,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 35, line 14, strike out the figures "900" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "1,000."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that that is new legislation.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order. The statute fixes the salary at $1,000. If a statutory salary is subject to a point of order, then the gentleman's point of order ought to be sustained. If the statutory salary is not subject to a point of order, then the gentleman's point of order ought to be overruled.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the statute makes provision for these officers, fixes the salary the same as a watchman, with an additional salary of $280, and if I have any mathematical sense that makes $1,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, it is unnecessary to waste time on the point of order, for I concede that it is not well taken. I withdraw the point of order. The same statute that we have been discussing fixes this salary at $1,000.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, on line 19, of the same page the committee increased the plumber's salary from $720 to $780. I want to commend the committee for that act. I want to pour out as high a compliment as is within my bosom to unload upon the committee, but the attitude of the committee here to-day reveals this fact about salaries. They will not permit an increase unless some head of a department advises them to do it.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Oh, Mr. Chairman, let the gentleman be fair.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to be fair.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. FOWLER. No; unless it is for a question. I know the heads of the departments are all wise men, but I do not concede to them that they know everything and that they should dictate to this House everything that we should do. In other words, I mean to say that they should not treat us as instruments upon which to play their favorite tunes. As men at the heads of departments I respect them and their instructions, but I do say, Mr. Chairman, that these low-salaried men, whose salaries have not been changed in many instances for more than three-quarters of a century, having been fixed by law, it is high time that they should at least be allowed the statutory salary, especially at a time when the cost of living is excessive. It is unfair to these laboring men—these men who eke out a living in the sweatshops—to cut their salaries below that fixed by the statute. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that this committee will consent to this little increase over the provision in the bill and allow these men their statutory salary.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a statement once for all for the benefit of the committee. There are many thousand people in the Government service. The salaries of all people in the departments at Washington, except the Agricultural Department, are provided for in this bill. The Committee on Appropriations does not know and it can not know, unless it is brought to the attention of the committee by the Secretaries or chief clerks of those in charge of these departments, what salaries ought to be increased and what salaries ought to be reduced. We are not personally acquainted with these people, and unless the department sends in a request or furnishes testimony to the committee, we accept current law.

Now, here are two places provided for at $900. A law was passed in 1875 providing that these places should receive $1,000, but in 1876 they were appropriated for at $900. They have been appropriated for at $900 ever since. This year the estimate comes to this committee asking us to provide for two places at $900. There is not one word of testimony furnished to the committee why we should provide any different sum.

I want to repudiate the idea that this committee desires to discriminate or to reduce salaries. We have reduced but two salaries in this whole bill, and those are in the Post Office Department. Those were large salaries that were reduced at the instance of the Postmaster General because the people who accepted the places were assured at the time that the salaries would be reduced in order to conform with the salaries of other people in like places. I do not have any feeling about this matter. I am glad when I can increase a salary, but we have absolutely no evidence upon which to guide the committee, and we feel that it would be unwarranted to appropriate a larger amount than the department has asked for.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, for one, I have no criticism to make of the very able and faithful men who constitute the Committee on Appropriations. They do more hard work here than any set of men in the House of Representatives, and they do it at the neglect of the interests of their constituents. In other words, they are taking off the shoulders of the Members of this House great burdens and responsibilities, and I sympathize with them when unfairly and unjustly criticized for their action on supply bills.

But in this connection I wish to call attention of the House to what I think is a just criticism which should be placed on all of us. We ought to provide a reclassification of the Government salaries. The employees in the executive departments and in the Government service elsewhere are receiving the same salaries now that have been paid for more than half a century, and yet we all know what a great difference there is in the cost of living between now and 5 and 10 and 30 and 40 and 50 years ago.

This bill establishes a salary of $720 for a clerk in the Indian Bureau in the Department of the Interior and $850 for the captain of a watch, and $720 for watchmen on duty every night in the year. Now, how can we justify a salary of only $720 to a clerk in the department who perhaps has the care and responsibility and the expense of maintaining a family? That is not a sufficient amount of money to properly clothe, feed, and care for an individual here in Washington, much less two or more members of the family. Then we give the custodian—the watchman—of public buildings—a man who has to perform his duties during the night, and with a responsibility in the watchful care and guardianship of the invaluable archives and records of the Government—and we pay him the magnificent sum of $720.

I think the time has arrived when we ought to find an opportunity to reclassify the Government salaries in such a way as would be just and fair to them and creditable to the membership of this House; and in doing that we should at the same time provide means for taking care of the worn-out, superannuated, and worthy employees in the Government service. It is a reflection upon both Houses of Congress and any administration which submits longer to this hardship, this unfairness and cruelty to these old, faithful, and efficient employees.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE. How would the gentleman do it—by devising some general system that would apply everywhere; or would he come into the House, pick out one man—as has been attempted here—advance his salary, pat himself on the back, and then say he had done this for labor?

Mr. AUSTIN. I would do equal and exact justice to all.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman would have a general and comprehensive plan, rather than pick out one man?

Mr. AUSTIN. A general plan, of course.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and, on a division demanded by Mr. FOWLER, there were—ayes 4, noes 30.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

General Supply Committee: Superintendent of supplies, $2,000; clerks, 2 of class 2; in all, $4,800.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do so for the purpose of reading to the committee certain resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of the citizens of New Orleans on Saturday last.

Those resolutions are as follows:

Resolutions of mass meeting of the citizens of New Orleans protesting against the unfair location of Federal reserve banks and the injection of politics into the national banking system.

At a mass meeting of the citizens of New Orleans, convened upon a joint call issued by the New Orleans Clearing House Association, New Orleans Association of Commerce, New Orleans Board of Trade, New Orleans Stock Exchange, New Orleans Sugar Exchange, New Orleans Contractors and Dealers Exchange, and New Orleans Real Estate Auction Exchange, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted by a rising vote:

"Whereas the Federal reserve act constituted the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Comptroller of the Currency as a 'reserve bank organization committee,' for the purpose of locating the Federal reserve banks and outlining the Federal reserve districts;

"Whereas that act expressly provided that the Federal reserve cities and the Federal reserve districts should be apportioned with due regard to the convenience and customary course of business within the United States and with foreign countries, and expressly provided that an investigation should be made by the organization committee, in order fairly to ascertain what the said convenience and customary course of trade might be;

"Whereas the said organization committee made such an investigation as was required by the statute creating it, and thereby secured valuable information as to the magnitude, importance, convenience, and customary course of the business of the various sections of the country, and as to the proper location of the reserve cities and the reserve districts contemplated by the act;

"Whereas said committee, instead of locating the reserve cities and reserve districts in accordance with the convenient and customary course of business, as pointed out in unmistakable terms by their investigation, has proceeded in many instances to locate and designate those cities and districts in utter and absolute disregard of the evident convenience and customary course of business, and in utter and absolute disregard of the just claims of certain important cities and communities, which claims are predicated upon convenience, customary course of business, population, commercial importance, geographical position, and financial requirements and capabilities;

"Whereas the action so taken in those cases indicates only too plainly that the conclusions reached were arrived at, not by a careful and impartial consideration of the merits of the claims of the respective parties, given with an eye single to the greatest good for the greatest number, but were reached and based upon considerations of political expediency or personal interest and aggrandizement;

"Whereas the fact that politics and the false guide of personal interests have entered into the conclusions reached unmistakably appears from the selection of Richmond, with a meager population of 127,628 and a total of banking resources of $50,000,000, and making tributary to this comparatively unimportant mart of trade the cities of Baltimore and Washington, the former with its population of 558,485 and its local banking resources of $309,669,000, and the latter with its prestige and importance as a National Capital, to which is added a population of 331,069 and banking resources of $110,081,000; the selection of Atlanta, a city in Georgia, with a population of not more than 154,839 and a total of banking resources amounting to $48,000,000, and serving only a purely local territory, a city self-confessedly unable, without assistance, to support a reserve bank, and the making subservient to this comparatively unimportant city so large and important a city as New Orleans, the metropolis of the South, the second port of the whole United States, the largest manufacturing center in the South—its manufactures being greater by more than $18,000,000 than the total manufactures of Dallas and Atlanta combined—the key to the dominant factor of, and the acknowledged financial center of the vast valley of the lower Mississippi, a city whose population of 339,075 is one and one-third times the combined populations of Dallas and Atlanta, whose banking capital is more than $1,000,000 greater than the combined capital of the banks of Dallas and Atlanta, whose banking resources of $104,829,110 is greater by $14,829,110 than the combined banking resources of Dallas and Atlanta, whose assessed valuation is one and one-third times as great as the assessed valuations of Dallas and Atlanta combined, whose enormous tributary country, whose early development of important banks and unrivaled banking history, whose position as the premier port of the Gulf of Mexico, the only seaboard which has been deprived entirely of recognition, whose presently tremendous and steadily increasing foreign trade through the Panama Canal and otherwise with its necessarily tremendous volume of foreign bills and attendant banking requirements, and whose acknowledged ability to support and care for a reserve bank alike demanded the location within its borders of such a bank; the arbitrary outlining of a reserve district in such a way as to cut off from New Orleans the greater part of its own convenient and tributary State of Louisiana, and the thrusting of that city as an adjunct into a district the greater part of which it normally and customarily leads; the thrusting of the remainder of the State of Louisiana customarily tributary to New Orleans into an alien and distant reserve district in contravention of its inclination, its convenience, its natural course of trade, its customs since time immemorial, and its logical channels of finance;

"Whereas the foundation of the banking system of this great country, not upon the firm rock of its own inherent merit and applicability to the needs of the whole people but upon the moving sands of the temporary demands of political faction, must necessarily result in disaster to the commerce and industry of the country and danger to our republican institutions: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the confidence of this community in the entire proposed banking system as a system founded on an earnest effort to meet the needs of the whole people, without regard to geographical location or political affiliation, and administered by impartial heads without bias or partisanship, is rocked and rent to its very foundation stone; that this community sees in a money power thus utilized in its inception to pay political debts and forge political fetters a menace to this Republic far more overwhelming than that which threatened the United States of Andrew Jackson and caused the dissolution of the Bank of the United States; that this community foresees the upbuilding in this country of ours of a plutocracy having at its command the vast financial resources of the Government, using those resources to increase its power and to maintain its sway, a plutocracy deaf to reason, blind to justice, scornful of right; that this citizenship now rises to crush in its infancy such an octopus and demands without delay a congressional investigation of the methods used and of the influences brought to bear upon the reserve-bank organization committee and a relocation of the reserve districts and cities in accordance with the just requirements of the business of the country and the provisions of the currency act; that this community demands in no uncertain terms that the reserve-bank organization committee be taught once and for all time that they serve and do not dominate, that their law is the welfare of the State not the welfare of their personal friends and political allies; that they are an instrument, not an autocrat; that they are not greater than but subservient to the people who created them.

"Be it further resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to the President of these United States, the reserve-bank organization committee, the Senators from Louisiana, the Congressmen from Louisiana, the Members of the United States Senate, the Members of the House of Representatives, and the public press.

"NEW ORLEANS, LA., April 4, 1914."

And if I have sought to read this protest, it is because I have been especially charged by the chairman of that mass meeting, the mayor of New Orleans, and by innumerable telegrams not to merely insert this into the RECORD, but to try and drive it into the minds of Members present by reading it to them. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the committee that while we in Georgia deeply sympathize with our friends from New Orleans and Louisiana in this disappointment, we think their indictment is not well taken against the administration and against the Federal Reserve Board. We think that, measured by its business activities, by the territory that it serves, industrially and commercially, the great metropolis of Georgia will compare favorably with New Orleans, although it is a younger city than the great Gulf metropolis; and I want to say on this floor that I do not for a moment credit the charge that undue political influence or personal persuasion had anything whatever to do with this decision. I want to say in behalf of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the Secretary of Agriculture, and of the Comptroller of the Currency that it is my belief and judgment that they made a fair, honest, and just decision, as best they could, of a very troublesome question. We all know, and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ] knows as well as we do, that it was not easy to decide this matter. There were many cities that had strong claims, and there were many ways that the problem could have been worked out, and I want to say that any way it had been worked out there would have been somebody dissatisfied.

Mr. DUPRÉ. And the gentleman from Georgia would be protesting as I and my people are had it been taken from the Coca-Cola metropolis. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDWICK. Possibly. That may be true; indeed, I am not inclined to doubt it. Human nature is very much the same in Georgia as in Louisiana. Yet I do not see any need for the gentlemen's city to be such a bad loser. Let them take it easy. The reserve board did the best they could with it, and tried to decide it right.

Mr. DUPRÉ. But they did not decide it right.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not know about that. The gentleman can not be the judge of that, nor can I. We could not agree about it. They did not decide it according to political persuasion or influence, but these men made an honest, earnest effort to do right, considering the whole commerce and industry and banking interests of the country. For one, I believe they did well and decided wisely. I might have been disappointed if they had not decided in favor of our Georgia metropolis, but I do not think I would have gone quite to the length of these resolutions, and I doubt whether my good friend from Louisiana, of whom personally I am very fond, would himself be inclined, on his own responsibility, to go that far. We all know that there are many cities in the South, in the East, in the North, and in the West that contended they were entitled to be selected as regional bank cities. They could not all be selected under the terms of this bill, and I do not think it becomes these gentlemen from Louisiana, because they are disappointed, in their disappointment to lay to this organization charges of the character they have preferred in these resolutions.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. May I say to the gentleman from Georgia that the State of Louisiana appreciates the kind words of the gentleman from Georgia, for it remembers that he was the chairman of the Hardwick sugar investigation; that he also made an attack on the Mississippi River the other day, because the Savannah River was not being taken care of, and we are used to these kind words from the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, while I appreciate the personal friendship of my friends from Louisiana, I think they are drawing a rather hard indictment against me politically. It was not any pleasure to me to injure anybody in Louisiana by my advocacy of free sugar, but I thought it was my duty to the whole country to adopt that course, as I believe the gentleman knows. It was not any pleasure for me to say that the Mississippi River ought not to have levee appropriations exclusively, and yet that contention also was right, as I saw it, from the standpoint of the whole country, and not alone from my local standpoint. It seems to me that the people in Louisiana have been unusually favored by the Federal Government. They have had one of their great industries for years given a bounty at the expense of every man, woman, and child in this country who eats sugar. They have had levees on the Mississippi River for 30 or 40 years or more—I can not be accurate about the time—and have had appropriated thirty-one millions and a half of money out of the Common Treasury for that purpose, while other sections, with equally strong cases, were being denied similar appropriations, and I freely concede that this sort of discrimination and special favor has never appealed to me.

It seems to me that the trouble with Louisiana is that it has had so much special favoritism shown it in the past that it finds it somewhat difficult to get along without such favoritism.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARDWICK. I would like to have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I desire to give notice that I am not going to permit this kind of debate to go on after the two minutes have expired.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Does not the gentleman think the board should be congratulated on not placing a reserve bank in a city composed of business men who would be guilty of getting up such a mendacious resolution as this?

Mr. HARDWICK. It looks to me that way; but I do not want to be too hard upon them, because they are, for the moment, sore and disappointed. It seems to me they have gone too far, and that they have said things they can not substantiate. The resolutions, in my judgment, are simply an outburst of passion and disappointment, and in cooler moments, when the shock of disappointment is past——

Mr. COPLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia to explain to this House how a Democrat from Louisiana could be a protectionist on sugar and a free trader on everything else?

Mr. HARDWICK. They have had such a hard time explaining that themselves that I would not like to take the job. I do not want to take over their explanation.

Mr. DUPRÉ. May I suggest we are not responsible either to the gentleman from Illinois or the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. HARDWICK. I readily concede that.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. I desire to ask the gentleman whether in the campaign for the location of the Federal bank the people were tied up with Richmond or not?

Mr. HARDWICK. Absolutely not. Atlanta made no combination with any city in this Republic. It fought this battle on its merits, and the case appealed to the judgment of this board. The question of political expediency or political combination was not considered at all.

Mr. PLATT. I merely wanted to say the Richmond Dispatch says the city of Cleveland was tied up to Richmond.

Mr. HARDWICK. If it was, I do not know, but the city of Atlanta fought its fight upon its merits and won easily and fairly, because it was entitled to win, as the commercial metropolis of the Southeast, where such a bank ought to be located in the interest of the banking industry and of commerce. While I am sorry others are disappointed, I think the attack of our Louisiana friends is not well founded.

Mr. DUPRÉ. We from Louisiana appreciate the courtesy of the victors in allowing us a voice in protest while the gentleman from Cleveland, Ohio, Mr. GORDON, raised an objection.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not object at all and I have the kindest regard for my friends from Louisiana, in spite of the fact I am not always able to agree with them about political questions.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, it is perfectly natural that there should be keen disappointment on the part of cities that sought to be designated as a situs for one of these regional banks and failed in their undertaking. It was the hope of my city that it might be designated as one of those cities, but I believe that a very great wrong is done to the country when men not only question the judgment of those who determine this matter, but attempt to question their motives. I do not agree, in my judgment, with the expression of the board, but I recognize, after a considerable study given, not only to the question of the boundary of the region that should include my State, but also the question of the boundaries over the country at large, that it was a proposition fraught with very great difficulty and one that had to embrace not simply the situation of the country to-day, but that had to carry in view what would be the effect in the near and far future; and for men to question the motives of those who have decided this matter because they voted against them will do a distinct hurt to the country in the administration of the law, which all of us, no matter what our original views may have been touching its efficiency, desire to be made a success. And I felt that coming from a city which had lost, but that is accustomed to take its losses with its victories in good humor, that it was proper here to protest against an attack upon the motives of men.

There is nothing that warrants, in my judgment, an imputation as to the reasons that actuated the three members of the board in determining this matter. Their judgment may or may not appeal to various men, but their motives ought not to be assailed by any man, particularly any Democrat on this floor.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. DUPRÉ. There is a belief in my mind, and I might as well voice it here, that the fact that the gentleman from Kentucky went down with a delegation from the city of Louisville and had a hearing in the city of New Orleans with regard to the claim of Louisville for a regional bank may have confused the minds of this organizing board in respect to the claim of Louisville and the city of New Orleans.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman's idea is not well founded, and if it had been, it might have given the only hope to New Orleans that she had.

Mr. TRIBBLE and Mr. MANN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] is recognized.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, in behalf of my State, I wish to express regret that the city of New Orleans filed this protest, especially in such strong language. I want to commend the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] for the stand he has taken. It is very commendable.

I desire to call attention to the fact that the only protests that have been filed on the floor of this House in regard to the selection of Atlanta as a reserve center come from the city of New Orleans and the city of Washington. I call your attention to the fact that these two cities for 50 years have been the most notorious wards of the United States Government of any two cities in the Union. They have been the wards of the Government so long that they think no other city in the Union has any right compared with the rights they should have. Mr. Chairman, the city of New Orleans has had the lion's share over half a century in appropriations for rivers and harbors. Every man on the floor of this House knows that that statement is a fact.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I will.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Has not the city of New Orleans had the lion's share of the waters of the Mississippi River during that time to care for?

Mr. TRIBBLE. They have been well cared for. The gentleman can make no complaint of the care this House has shown for the waters of the Mississippi River. They have been abundantly cared for. Millions have been spent in and about New Orleans, enabling that city to prosper and grow. As to the city of Washington, this House has educated her children, this House has policed her streets, built the schoolhouses, paid one-half of the municipal taxes of its government year after year since 1874, and yet they come here and claim they should have a regional bank. Why? Because these two cities, the wards of the Government, think they should be favored in preference to all other cities throughout the country.

Mr. Chairman, I think that the criticism of this board in the city of New Orleans is unfair.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I will.

Mr. POU. I merely wanted to remark to my friend from Georgia that I have about one dozen post offices in my district, and that there are more than 50 or 60 gentlemen who feel that they ought to get those dozen post offices. I do not know how to make 12 post offices go around to 50 candidates. Does not the gentleman think that these gentlemen that decided this matter are entitled to our sympathy rather than our criticism?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Indeed, I do. I think the gentleman occupies the same position that all the Members on the floor of this House occupy in regard to post offices. We do the best we can in the selection of postmasters, and yet many friends become political enemies because there are not enough offices for all. The board making the selection of reserve cities could not select all applicants. I wish to say to the gentleman that I do not desire to be severe on New Orleans, but I think she deserved criticism in this instance. It is known that the State of Georgia is the greatest State in the South; it is known that the city of Atlanta is the gate city of the South; and it is conceded by everyone not interested that the empire State of the South and the gate city of the South should have, as a matter of right, the regional reserve bank.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me for a quarter of a minute in order to ask a question? I wanted to suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina, with his post-office troubles, that he would probably do what the Reserve Board has done—select his friends.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I was just going to remark that the reference of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] is not a happy one. If he has a few offices and 8 or 10 candidates for each one, I dare say he does take into consideration the politics of the subject when he makes the recommendation. That is the difficulty with the reserve-bank cities.

Now, I have a great deal of confidence in the personal integrity and honesty of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Agriculture. I do not know so much about and do not have so much confidence in the new Comptroller of the Currency. Those gentlemen constituted a board to select the reserve banks. It was unfortunate that the Democratic Congress in passing the law provided that a purely Democratic board should select these reserve-bank locations. It should have been at least partly nonpartisan or bipartisan. The charge which was made against the currency and banking bill was that it would result in partisan action. There is only one way of refuting that charge, and that is by having no partisan action, when you have action at all. Unfortunately, a large proportion of the country believes that politics should have something to do with the selection of the reserve-bank locations. I do not suppose myself that the Secretary of the Treasury or the Secretary of Agriculture were consciously affected by partisan consideration, though I have no doubt that they heard a great deal more privately from people high up in Democratic councils than they heard from people in Republican or Progressive councils. It is a somewhat wide belief that the "personal touch" had something to do with the selection of some of these locations. I do not know whether that be the case or not. Anyone, I think, can see that in the districting of the country into Federal reserve districts the lines of trade have not been followed. It was supposed they would be followed. I appreciate, of course, that no selection could have been made which would have given entire satisfaction; but unless the President when he names the Federal reserve board shall make a better selection than the board made in selecting the location of the banks, it will be believed throughout the country that politics is having too much influence in a matter from which politics ought to be entirely banished. [Applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes, and at the end of that time, though I do not want to be discourteous to anybody, I must insist on going on with the bill.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I hope the gentleman will not insist on that. I wish to make some observations upon this item in the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. What is that?

Mr. WILLIS. I wish to speak upon this item in the bill. I hope the gentleman will not——

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] has the floor.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of discussing this matter at this time on the floor of this House, but in as much as it has been brought up by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ], who feels that the State which he represents in part has not been treated justly in the selection of these reserve centers, I do not want by my silence to appear to acquiesce in the decision wherein Baltimore has been passed over to the benefit of the city of Richmond.

There exists in the city of Baltimore, and I may say in the whole State of Maryland, a very deep and earnest feeling on this subject. We experience difficulty in believing that we have been given entirely a fair and square deal. We can not believe that overnight we have been evicted from our historic position as the chief commercial and financial city of the South. Notwithstanding the bristling array of figures with which the organization committee fortifies its position, a strongly marked suspicion exists in many quarters that possibly considerations which never should have figured in this matter have played a decisive and controlling part. I do not want to believe that outside considerations influenced the organization committee. I prefer to believe that they did not, but I must confess that I am wholly confounded in my efforts to reconcile the action of the organization committee in Baltimore's case with the facts and conditions as we actually know them to exist.

THE FIFTH RESERVE DISTRICT.

The committee on organization of the regional reserve banks has divided the country into a number of districts, in district No. 5 of which is placed Maryland, the District of Columbia, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and the greater part of West Virginia. The regional reserve center of this district is fixed at Richmond. This selection was made despite the fact that, according to the United States Census of 1910, Richmond had a population of only 127,628 people, as against Baltimore's population of 558,485, not including its large suburbs; that Richmond now has 7 national banks, as against Baltimore's 15; that the capital and surplus of the Richmond national banks is $9,314,392, as against a capital and surplus of the Baltimore national banks of $19,205,720; that the individual deposits in the Richmond national banks were $25,705,866, as against Baltimore's individual deposits in her national banks of $42,553,451; and regardless of the fact that the loans and discounts of the Richmond national banks were $35,593,044, as against those of the Baltimore national banks of $60,312,953.

If we go a step further and include in our consideration all banks—National, State, savings, and loan and trust companies—we find that the total surplus and capital of the Richmond banks is $16,810,955, as against those of Baltimore of $47,952,469; that the individual deposits in the Richmond banks amounted to $35,371,126, as against those of Baltimore of $190,679,440; that the loans and discounts of the Richmond banks were $50,004,572, as against those of Baltimore of $118,912,253.

It is such comparisons as these that force us to doubt the wisdom of the organization committee in the preference it has shown for Richmond over Baltimore.

BALTIMORE'S PROXIMITY TO THE SOUTH.

I wish to call the attention of this committee to the position Baltimore occupies for transportation by water and by rail, and to show how this important port has been overlooked in the commanding position in the district of which she is a part.

Our city is located on the Patapsco River, not far distant from the Chesapeake Bay. We have a channel depth from the ocean to Baltimore of 35 feet. We own docks and piers costing upward of $14,000,000. Not alone have we ships carrying the goods of our city and those of the other parts of our country to the ports of the world, but we have a great coastwise business by virtue of our location at the head of that magnificent inland water, the Chesapeake Bay, and by its waters to the rivers of Maryland and Virginia and along the Atlantic coast to the coast and river ports of the other Southern States. The shipping interest of Baltimore by water has reached vast proportions and is steadily increasing.

In railroad facilities Baltimore occupies a unique position. I know of no better illustration than to say that taking the South and the North as the large parts of an hourglass, Baltimore would be located at the neck of this geographical hourglass. The railroads of the South pass through the neck of this hourglass and then diverge into the northern and eastern sections of our country, so that the freight and passenger traffic from the South passes through the metropolis of Maryland to reach the North. Baltimore is, therefore, strategically located. Not only with splendid shipping facilities and hundreds of trains, but by reason of this location, she possesses unexcelled mail facilities. It is therefore easier to transact business with Baltimore, and it can be done quicker, as a general rule, than with the city of Richmond, except as to a very small portion of the regional district.

TRADE WITH SOUTH.

The business done by the people of Baltimore with the South has reached vast proportions. We have made that section our close customers. Our trade organizations have solicited and secured the good will and trade of those people. Our traveling salesmen go into every nook and corner. On the shelves of practically every southern store can be seen the goods, wares, and merchandise from Baltimore. Her people are our people; our banks are at her disposal and our business men her friends. Hundreds of the leading merchants visit our city every year to purchase goods and renew friendships. To give you some idea of the business Baltimore does with the people of the fifth regional district and Georgia, Florida, and Alabama I call your attention to the table following, which shows that 132 corporations, firms, manufacturers, and jobbers of Baltimore distributed in that section $63,338,000, or 56¾ per cent of their product.

Table showing distribution of general trade.

Distributed in District of Columbia	$4,360,000
Distributed in Virginia	18,873,000
Distributed in West Virginia	7,693,000
Distributed in North Carolina	13,614,000
Distributed in South Carolina	6,963,000
Distributed in Georgia	5,811,000
Distributed in Florida	3,337,000
Distributed in Alabama	2,688,000
Total in the territory indicated	63,338,000 or 56.75 per cent.
Distributed in Maryland	27,814,000 or 24.90 per cent.
Distributed miscellaneous	20,513,000 or 18.35 per cent.
Total distribution 132 corporations, firms, manufacturers, and jobbers	111,666,000

SOUTHERN INVESTMENTS.

There is a great army of Baltimore capitalists directly interested in the South, whose investments in the Southern States below the Potomac is some $200,000,000. It is impossible to give a detailed census of the amount, but when you realize that three savings institutions of our city—the Savings Bank of Baltimore, the Eutaw Savings Bank, and the Central Savings—had on deposit on December 31 over $67,000,000, representing 121,501 accounts, and of this sum, from these three institutions alone, $23,000,000, or more than 38 per cent was invested in the Southern States, from this one can gather some idea of our large investments in that section.

The business of our city is not dominated by a comparatively small number of houses, but it is a business in which a vast number of people are interested. It is a community of small workers primarily, all lending their aid to the support and progress of some 700,000 population of Baltimore and its suburbs. It seems unnatural and against all business judgment to compel a city of this size, having a business of such magnitude, to clear through the city of Richmond, of some 150,000 population, of much smaller financial and business institutions, away from the Atlantic seaboard and doing but little business with foreign ports.

NEARNESS TO THE WEST.

Mr. Chairman, by reason of the facilities of Baltimore and its nearness to the West we are doing second to the largest grain business of the country. It will be seen from the table, which follows, that Baltimore's grain shipments amounted to over 40,000,000 bushels, while the largest shipping port—New York—amounted to only about 2,500,000 bushels more. In other words, we are doing 34 per cent of the grain-export business of the country, while New York is doing 36.1 per cent of that business, I introduce for the information of the committee the following table:

Total grain exports.

Ports.	Wheat.	Per cent.	Corn.	Per cent.	Oats.	Per cent.	Total.	Per cent.
Boston	15,913,931	19.9	3,643,846	12.1	894,551	11.8	20,452,328	17.4
New York	32,892,192	41.1	5,789,046	19.2	3,784,439	50.1	42,456,677	36.1
Philadelphia	12,694,000	15.9	1,610,100	5.4	363,014	4.8	14,667,114	12.5
Baltimore	18,435,995	23.1	19,125,336	63.3	2,521,548	33.3	40,082,879	34.0

We are closer to the West and therefore have cheaper freight rates than any of the cities along the Atlantic seaboard. These lower rates are obtained not by favoritism or as a special privilege, but because Baltimore stands at the apex of that favoring curve of the Atlantic coast, thus reducing the distance from Baltimore to the Middle and Far West; she is even closer to the city of Buffalo, one of the ports of the Great Lakes, than the city of New York itself. From the table I insert you can readily see why Baltimore draws trade from that vast territory to which she is so close, and for the same reason why she draws trade from the islands of the sea and European countries, desiring to ship through her port by the most direct route to that rich territory. For instance, look at this table:

	Miles.
Distance from Baltimore to Buffalo	395
Distance from Boston to Buffalo	481
Distance from New York to Buffalo	411
Distance from Philadelphia to Buffalo	416
Distance from Baltimore to Chicago	782
Distance from Boston to Chicago	1,006
Distance from New York to Chicago	907
Distance from Philadelphia to Chicago	817
Distance from Baltimore to St. Louis	927
Distance from Boston to St. Louis	1,221
Distance from New York to St. Louis	1,052
Distance from Philadelphia to St. Louis	962

BALTIMORE INDUSTRIES.

I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that I would be doing full justice to the subject unless I brought before this committee some data and information regarding the vast industries of Baltimore. I do not think merely because Baltimore does a tremendous business it should be the location of the regional bank, but because this business which it transacts extends into the Southern States, which purchase in our city, and because wherever a large mercantile and export and import business is done there should be the finances with which to do it. For that reason I desire to lay before the committee a statement of a few of these industries.

Baltimore stands first in the manufacture of straw hats, cotton duck, fertilizers, men's clothing, copper metal and copper products, canning and preserving, and as an oyster and banana market.

As a jobbing center Baltimore ranks third among the cities of the United States. Its jobbing trade was approximately $400,000,000 in 1911. These figures do not include retail houses or purchases, but sales only.

According to the best judgment obtainable, Baltimore's manufacturing and jobbing trade has increased 25 per cent in the last two years.

According to the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association, Baltimore employs between 8,000 and 9,000 traveling salesmen.

According to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, the average annual tonnage of freight received and distributed at Baltimore by railroad and boat lines totaled 48,000,000 tons in 1912.

The value of the fish and oyster products of the Chesapeake Bay and adjacent waters is between $35,000,000 and $40,000,000 annually. Approximately 100 carloads of oysters were shipped from Baltimore to points north and west in one day last November.

The full assessable basis for taxation in the city of Baltimore has grown from $402,816,097 in 1901 to $781,691,094 in 1914, an increase of $378,874,997 in a little more than a decade.

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS.

I had supposed that the regional reserve banks were intended to deal to a large extent with foreign exchange, and for that reason it is quite impossible for me to comprehend why a city away from the seaboard and having practically no exports and imports should be selected above one on the coast. Baltimore with her unique geographical position, transportation facilities, and lower freight rates than any other city on the Atlantic seaboard, with city-owned docks, with 18 miles of water front suitable for docking purposes, has made great strides in her foreign trade and which will no doubt outstrip her other activities with the opening of the Panama Canal. For the purpose of showing what has been accomplished, I insert a table showing the imports and exports of the city of Baltimore during the last 10 years.

Imports and exports.

Calendar year.	Imports.	Exports.
1904	$18,761,963	$84,099,727
1905	25,226,618	103,550,042
1906	35,364,145	107,609,144
1907	36,184,322	99,322,342
1908	23,722,054	81,874,087
1909	27,418,567	79,424,914
1910	32,377,480	72,944,146
1911	28,382,580	94,465,806
1912	27,901,843	100,287,327
1913	35,553,814	117,269,378

I have nothing to say against the city of Richmond. It is a splendid city. But I do think that a city of nearly 700,000 people should have some consideration over a city of only 120,000 to 150,000 people. I say, therefore, that I do not propose to sit idly by and let this House think Baltimore is satisfied with this situation. We are certainly not satisfied. The people of my city fully realize the difficulty encountered in locating these banks, but they can not understand why a city such as Richmond, not along the seaboard, so much smaller than Baltimore, not doing a foreign business, as we are doing, a city not connected with the West as we are connected with it, a city not in as close proximity to the North and the West as we are, and transacting only a small amount of business in comparison to that of Baltimore, should be preferred over our city.

The people of my city can not understand why the organization committee turned down Baltimore, with its vast financial institutions, its large manufactures, and its great import and export business; a city which has at all times been considered as the gateway to the South, through which all business and traffic has to pass between the northern section of our country and the southern section, and that city which has done so much toward the financing of the railroads of the Southern States, and which has been known ever since the Civil War as the financial center of the South. [Applause.]

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do.

Mr. PLATT. Has the gentleman seen what Maj. John H. Dooley, of Richmond, wrote on January 21, 1914, to John Skelton Williams? Mr. Dooley is one of the men who apparently influenced the selection of the Comptroller of the Currency by his letter of January 21—a remarkable letter, which included these words:

> Washington is the Capital City of the United States, but occupies no peculiar relation to the South either geographically, politically, in banking, in commerce, or in transportation. Baltimore has no claim to be a city of that southern division. She is north of the line which divides the North from the South.

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; I have not read that letter. But the city of Baltimore is south of Mason and Dixon's line, which has always been considered the line dividing the North from the South; but whether it is or is not a city of the southern division should not enter into the matter.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. Will the gentleman tell what are the aggregate loans of Baltimore in the Southern States as compared with the loans of the city of Richmond?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Oh, I understand the gentleman to say that the city of Richmond has loans and securities in the Southern States to the amount of $33,000,000, but I want to tell him that a large portion of that money is derived from loans by Baltimore banks to Richmond banks. That is where you get your money to loan. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the gentleman that Richmond loans $33,000,000 to the Southern States and Baltimore loans only $6,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for sufficient time to answer the gentleman's question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is their objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to say to the gentleman from Virginia that three institutions in Baltimore—the Central Savings Bank, the Eutaw Savings Bank, and one other savings bank of our city—loaned to the South and have securities from the South in their deposit vaults to the amount of $23,000,000, and the total loans are over $200,000,000 to the Southern States.

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the gentleman in answer to that that the report of the Comptroller of the Currency for January was to the effect that the total loans by the banks of Baltimore to the Southern States were about $6,000,000, as compared with $33,000,000 loaned to the national banks of the Southern States by the banks of the city of Richmond.

Mr. LINTHICUM. A large part of the sum the gentleman mentions—$33,000,000—is not loaned in this district.

Mr. GLASS. I would say to the gentleman that we are not establishing regional banks for the city of Richmond or for the city of Baltimore, but for district No. 5; and of all the banks in that district that voted on the question, Baltimore did not receive a respectable number.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to say to the gentleman from Virginia that Baltimore got any number of letters from the South in which the banks stated they wanted Baltimore.

Mr. GLASS. I say that a careful poll of all the banks was made, and Richmond was the choice.

The CHAIRMAN. These proceedings are going on by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Maryland if the city of Baltimore had any chance whatever against the city of Richmond, when my friend Mr. GLASS, the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, comes from Virginia, and the Comptroller of the Currency, Mr. John Skelton Williams, one of the members of the board making the selection, comes from Richmond?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will leave it to the gentleman from Virginia to answer that question.

Mr. GLASS. I wish to say that "the gentleman from Virginia" has had nothing whatever to do with the selection of these banks; nothing whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. These proceedings are being conducted by unanimous consent.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not accuse anybody of political pull in this matter. And I want to say further that if Baltimore is left out and Richmond is continued as the location of this regional reserve bank it will be found that no city in the district will stand by it more than will the city of Baltimore. But I must say that there is no comparison between the claims of Richmond for the location of that bank and the claims of the great city of Baltimore.

Mr. GLASS. The gentleman ought to show that by presenting facts and not by mere assertions.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Oh, I have so many facts here that it would take all day to even look at them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has again expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire recognition?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this very discussion shows the futility of it. Not only is there a great difference of opinion regarding the action of the reserve bank organization committee in organizing the districts and locating the banks, but gentlemen are not even able to agree upon the facts upon which the discussion should be conducted.

It is quite apparent that no one in this House has all of the information that was possessed by the committee and upon which it reached its conclusions; and, more than that, it must be remembered that the action of this committee is not conclusive and binding forever. A new financial system for the United States has been formulated and is about to be launched. Preliminary organization work was necessary. After considerable discussion the officials were selected to outline the organization, so as to permit the new system to be launched. The law provides that the determination of the organization committee shall not be subject to review except by the Federal Reserve Board when organized. If injustices have been done, if mistakes have been made, after this system is in operation it is quite apparent that the errors will be corrected. Much complaint is indulged in because certain banks were located in certain cities and certain territory was included in one district rather than in another.

The character and number of the complaints only emphasize the difficulty that must have confronted the committee. I do not give much heed to the suggestion that politics controlled the action of this committee. Its members were as impartial and disinterested and patriotic and sincere as any other three men occupying similar positions under any administration within my knowledge. The law required that the districts should be apportioned "with due regard to the convenience and customary course of business, and that they should not necessarily be coterminous with any State or States." Those who had certain connections, whose business was adjusted along certain lines, would be dissatisfied at any arrangement which interfered with the long-established course of business; and yet, when the purpose of Congress in establishing this system is borne in mind, it must be remembered that until it is actually in operation and the results are ascertained it is difficult for anyone to determine just what the effect will be.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the fling of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was justified. So far as this House is concerned, and so far as the country is concerned, I believe it is everywhere agreed that the President, so far as anyone knows, has not intended, and does not intend, to play petty or partisan politics in his selection of the members of the Federal Reserve Board, nor is there any justification for any such suggestion. As far as I am concerned, I believe that when he announces the members of the Federal Reserve Board, while a great many disappointed candidates will perhaps be found vociferous in their criticisms of the selections he will make, the country itself will be amply satisfied with the type, character, and representative standing of the men whom he will select and appoint.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, this appears to be a controversy between New Orleans, Atlanta, Richmond, and Baltimore. Thereupon the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] rises to remark that it is believed that politics has played an important part. Just why that charge should be appropriate in a contest between the cities named is not very apparent. The gentleman's own city is cared for—Chicago gets one of these regional reserve banks. I suppose what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] would like would be the reestablishment of the old system which his party stood for so long, by which the entire country was under the domination of one great commercial center. In any event, whether these gentlemen have made mistakes or not, there seems to be little controversy upon this point at least—the new system is an improvement on the old, and I respectfully submit that there is no basis whatever for the charge made by the gentleman from Illinois. Gentlemen on this floor should not impugn the motives of high-minded men in the discharge of their duty by saying it is believed that politics has played an important part.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of projecting myself into the friendly controversy that has arisen over the selection of the reserve cities, and should not have done so had not some of my colleagues around me asked me if I had any information or opinion as to the matter. Upon my advising them I had neither information nor opinion, they suggested that, under the prevailing practice, I should submit a few remarks, saying that that had been the rule governing the conduct of some gentlemen here in discussing the currency question. [Laughter.] Being a young man very desirous to live up to the traditions and rules of this House, I simply rise for that purpose and no other. Seriously, I would suggest, however, for the information of some of the gentlemen that if they had to face the problem which confronted this organization board I doubt if any of them would question the sincerity of these gentlemen in the selections they have made.

This question came up very early in the consideration of the bill in the committee. I was of the opinion that we should designate the different reserve cities. Those of us who thought we should undertake to select the reserve cities fell into the same error that my good friend from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] has fallen into; that is, that population alone should determine the question as to where these banks should be located.

If the size of a city alone should govern that then this House could very easily have located these 12 regional reserve cities, and the population, as given by the recent census, would have conclusively determined the choice. But a very interesting fact developed when, as members of the Currency Committee, we investigated the question, and some of us at least found a very good reason for taking the position that this question should be considered, not from the standpoint of cities but from the standpoint of regions, from the standpoint of the territory that was to be served. So instead of undertaking to select 12 or 18 cities the question came up as to how many different regions it was necessary to have, with due regard for the natural course of business already existing. The committee, after full consideration of that question, determined that 12 would be sufficient. I venture the assertion that that board has done what this House thought it would do and what the members of the committee thought it would do; and have not located these reserve banks from the standpoint of cities, but from the standpoint of the regions to be served. Then, the first problem confronting them was what are the 12 natural regions of this country, divided according to the course of commerce and of banking? I think any man who has taken the trouble to investigate the natural courses of banking business in this country will find that the organization board has very properly divided this country in its selection of the 12 districts.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Did not the board also do that largely by inquiry of the banks themselves?

Mr. WINGO. I was coming to that. I have not discussed the question with any of the members of the organization board, but I have an idea that, with due regard for what was required of them as sensible men, they did not assume that Congress asked them to select 12 large cities. It is true with reference to cities as it is with reference to men that size does not always determine strength. A man's avoirdupois does not necessarily denote his strength, and population does not necessarily determine the business strength of a city. When the organization board once decided the regions into which this country should be divided, tentatively at least, then I am sure they undertook to consult those banks which had indicated a desire to come into the system, and I venture the assertion that if you were to get the facts you would find that every reserve city has been located, not because of any desire on the part of the members of the organization board to favor some community, or for partisan reasons, but that they have followed in every instance the wish of the majority of the banks in the regions to be served, together with their judgment of what city in each region would best serve the business of that region.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman believe that the majority of the banks of the region in which New Orleans is situated preferred Atlanta to New Orleans?

Mr. WINGO. I do not know, because I have no information on that.

Mr. MURDOCK. But the gentleman says he thinks that was the determining factor in most of the districts.

Mr. WINGO. I think that was one of the factors. The gentleman asked me my opinion.

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WINGO. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I naturally would have been glad to see New Orleans have a reserve bank. If you were selecting the cities by population alone, you would probably include that city.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. For a question.

Mr. PLATT. Is there any country on the face of the earth that would pass over and circumscribe and cut down its financial center and its Capital City as this board has done, limiting the city of New York and passing by the city of Washington?

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman presupposes that that has been done. I do not think they tried to do it.

Mr. PLATT. They cut off all of the cities on the other side of the Hudson River from New York.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I do not know, but my investigation has led me to ascertain this fact: That some of the largest banking institutions of this country have a great deal less of outside clientage than some of the smaller banking institutions in the same city. For instance, here is a bank with three or four million dollars deposits, and another bank in the same city with only $1,000,000 deposits, and yet the bank that has only $1,000,000 deposits has a larger country clientage than the bank with three or four millions deposits.

Mr. PLATT. I want to say that the banks in Newark and Jersey City belong to the New York Clearing House, and those cities are as much a part of New York as is Brooklyn.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I want to say that in order to consummate this arrangement it became necessary to divide the State, so that three-quarters of the State of Louisiana does business in Dallas and the rest, including New Orleans, with Atlanta.

Mr. WINGO. I will say to my amiable friend that it may be that when I grow as old as he I will have less confidence in men put in public office, but you will have to present some facts other than those that are presented here to make me believe that the organization board, composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Comptroller of the Currency, have deliberately played petty, partisan politics with this great question. I do not believe either of these gentlemen capable of the base motives attributed to them by their critics.

Mr. GLASS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Certainly.

Mr. GLASS. I will ask my colleague if it is not a fact that the law expressly contemplated a division of States when it said the organization committee need not follow State lines?

Mr. WINGO. I think that is true, and there was a reason for that. Investigation will show that banking capital does not always follow along State lines. That is illustrated by the fact that Missouri has received two of these banks. The man who does not think about it and has no knowledge of the conditions will not understand this. Any man who has even a superficial knowledge of this question knows that Kansas City and St. Louis are each the center of great commercial regions, which regions are just as distinctive as the regions surrounding Chicago and San Francisco.

Mr. GLASS. And they are 300 miles apart and have distinct characters of business. Gentlemen here are criticizing that arrangement who were advocating placing one of the banks in Philadelphia and one at Baltimore, only 60 miles apart.

Mr. WINGO. The whole basis for this criticism is that you wish to follow geographical and population lines, when this House and the committee decided without any question that geographical lines should not determine the regions, but that you should follow the lines of business, and you can only follow the lines of business as shown by the information gathered by the board from the banks.

Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Does the gentleman from Illinois want to reply to this bank business again? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I want to reply to an attack made on me.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. We have been going on with this outside discussion for an hour. Does the gentleman from Missouri want some time?

Mr. BOOHER. I want two minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. I want two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina make any requests, if not the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, just a moment. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] said that the only complaint made in reference to the selection of these banks was the complaint from Baltimore about the Richmond location and the complaint from New Orleans about the Atlanta location.

Mr. POU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's horizon is, as usual, very limited. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. POU. I said in the beginning that this particular controversy was between those cities; I did not say it was the only complaint.

Mr. MANN. That is the same thing, and the gentleman criticized me because he could not see farther than a short distance away. The fact is there is universal complaint throughout the country. It is true that the members of the board who made the selection are probably satisfied. Following a practice which has often been charged that the members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors do not entirely neglect their own localities, it is apparent that the Secretary of the Treasury receives a bank in New York, the Comptroller of the Currency receives a bank in his little city, and the Secretary of Agriculture gets two banks in his State; and that outside of New York the other two do not receive the business which naturally trend in their direction. Now, gentlemen may say that the board had difficulties. Of course they had difficulties. No selection could have been made without difficulties, but we believe that this board was governed to a large extent by partisan considerations in making the selection.

The only way that belief can be removed will be by the future conduct of the banks, if it can be removed in that way. It will be a sorry day for this country when gentlemen, through legislation, have injected politics into the financial operations of the country. [Applause.] We feared that that was being done when the banking and currency bill came before the House. We expressed our fears at that time. We were told that our fears were baseless. Up to date, up to the present time, the fears do not appear to have been baseless. All that has been done up to now apparently has taken politics into consideration. We hope it will not continue.

My distinguished friend from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], for whom I have a high regard, said that he had not endeavored to influence the board in selecting these locations. I do not suppose that he did, and yet, if I recall correctly, weeks ago my friend said that one of the banks would be located in the comparatively small city of Richmond, and be surrounded by a district containing larger and much more important cities.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to my friend that he is absolutely mistaken. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. MANN. All I know is that the newspapers so reported a speech which the gentleman made, which I read. Newspapers, however, have often made mistakes.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact, I knew nothing whatsoever about the purposes of the organization committee. I hoped a regional reserve bank would be located at Richmond; but when I first took the slightest interest in the matter it was from a prompting of State pride and with no idea on earth that one of those banks would be located at Richmond. However, upon the presentation of the facts, Richmond made an infinitely better claim for the bank than some of the cities that are now complaining about not getting it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman says that he did not state in a speech some time ago that Richmond would be selected, in his opinion, then I am very sorry that I called the attention of the House to an erroneous statement.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, I state that most explicitly.

Mr. MANN. We are told now, because, I expect, of the present partisan division, that the Federal Reserve Board will not be appointed until the tolls question is settled.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, Mr. Chairman, there has been no partisan division at all. Are we to assume that my friend thinks a Democratic Federal Reserve Board put a Federal reserve bank in Philadelphia to make that a Democratic city?

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make one or two observations relative to the bill, and especially with reference to the particular portion of the bill that is now before us. This debate on the Federal reserve banks, which has continued for an hour and a half, has demonstrated what nobody had any doubt about, namely, that our friends on the other side of the aisle were hopelessly divided upon the question and do not know how to settle the financial question, anyhow.

The last item that the Clerk read was that contained in lines 7 and 8, on page 36:

General Supply Committee: Superintendent of Supplies, $2,000; clerks—2 of class 2; in all, $4,800.

I am calling attention to this in order that the attention of the committee may be directed to this very important bureau of the Government. I think, Mr. Chairman, that there is no other governmental entity that occupies the peculiar and unusual position which is occupied by this General Supply Committee.

The nature of the duties of this General Supply Committee and the difficulties under which it works are explained in part by statements in the hearings on this bill, at pages 83 to 85, from which I now quote:

Mr. JOHNSON. What, in brief, are the duties of this committee? I am asking this question because a good many members of this subcommittee are new.

Mr. BRIGGS. The duties are to ascertain the needs and requirements of the departments as regards general supplies. Those items which are in common use by two or more departments are scheduled and proper specifications are written in connection therewith, and these specifications are sent to the commercial public, inviting proposals for supplying such material on a particular day, as advertised, at which time the bids are opened. All the bids on a particular item are tabulated together on a single sheet and that allows the committee to know at a glance who all the bidders are. Then all the samples, which are in many instances called for, are brought together for the consideration of the committee. The committee, in connection with experts from the different branches of the service which are interested, then recommends awards to the Secretary of the Treasury, and upon his approval of such recommendations contracts accordingly are drawn, which are executed on the part of the bidders and by the Secretary of the Treasury on the part of the Government.

Mr. JOHNSON. Coming down to the specific item in the bill, your force heretofore has been made up of details, has it not?

Mr. BRIGGS. It has; yes, sir; with the exception of a superintendent at $2,000 and two clerks at $1,400 each.

Mr. JOHNSON. You are asking this year for $23,940. Now, why is it necessary to increase this appropriation from $4,800 to $23,940 in one year? What is the objection to continuing the old practice of your force being made up of details from the various departments, where they are supposed to be familiar with the wants of the departments?

Mr. BRIGGS. If we could have a well-selected detailed force for continuous work, possibly we could get along in that way, although it would hardly be satisfactory. The difficulty has been that the departments have not supplied a permanent force—that is, the clerks have not been detailed permanently. They would be detailed for a while, and then they would be withdrawn by the department from which they came, and other clerks substituted for them; then such new clerks, after becoming somewhat familiar with the business, would be taken away and others put in their places. And the efficiency of the clerks as a general thing, I regret to say, has not been extremely satisfactory.

Mr. JOHNSON. If we give you what you are asking, these people will be entirely under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Treasury and will owe no allegiance to any other department?

Mr. BRIGGS. None at all.

Mr. BORLAND. Where have these clerks been detailed from—from the various departments?

Mr. BRIGGS. From the various departments; yes. From the Department of Agriculture, from the Post Office Department, the Department of Commerce, and the Government Printing Office. The greater portion of them, however, has perhaps come from the Treasury Department.

Mr. BORLAND. Is that because the clerks detailed from the other departments are supposed to be familiar with the needs of those departments?

Mr. BRIGGS. No, sir. They usually detail from one office to another those clerks that they can spare the best. I will state for the information of the committee that during the last year we had 12 members on our permanent force—that is, what we call the "permanent" force, as nearly as it can be so described. We had clerks detailed for a month or so, and then others coming in and taking their places; but we had, all told, a force numbering about 12 all of the year; and that is about the force that is required to conduct these matters until the rush season of the year comes, when the specifications are being made and issued, bids invited, tabulations made, awards recommended, and contracts drawn. All that has to be done at the office, and last year we had 37 temporary clerks engaged on this work for a period of about four months, and these were in addition to our permanent force, so called.

As noted here, it has but a small permanent force—a superintendent and two clerks. As a matter of fact, the work of that General Supply Committee is performed by clerks that are detailed from the other departments. My attention has been called to what appears in the hearings relative to the work of this General Supply Committee, and the first thing to which I wish to direct the attention of the committee is this: That this General Supply Committee, although it has been in existence only a comparatively short time, has been a means of saving a vast sum of the people's money. I refer now to the hearings at page 87, to get an illustration of the kind of work that this committee has been doing. I suppose Members of the House understand that up to four years ago there was no definite system regulating the purchase of supplies for the different departments of the Government. It was found, however, that here one department was paying a certain amount for lead pencils and another department was paying perhaps twice as much for exactly the same grade of lead pencil. Here would be one independent establishment paying so much for paper and another independent establishment or department would be paying perhaps two or three times as much, not because there was any crookedness or graft in any department, but because of the system of business management. The purchases were made by different departments in small quantities, without any agreement or understanding whatsoever, with the result that the Government was unable to secure the advantage which would flow to it if purchases were made in large quantities, if supplies were standardized.

As the appropriations for supplies are not all in a lump sum, amounting up into millions like that for a battleship, a mammoth public building, or a Panama Canal, you find them liberally sifted into all the appropriation bills in innocent-looking amounts of from $250, $500, $3,000 up to hundreds of thousands of dollars, but these amounts in the aggregate would make a sum which would pay for a big section of the Panama Canal. It is not to be inferred that I consider the appropriations excessive or ill advised, but it is the method of providing and distributing the supplies to which our attention and action should be invited. In fact there is no uniform plan for buying or distributing. Each department, bureau, and establishment has a method of its own and different from the others.

Right here in Washington where business operations of the Government are under the daily observation and subject to the sharp scrutiny of the eagle eyes of the appropriation committees, there are at least 100 or more appropriations on account of which separate orders are sent for supplies of the same kind for delivery from the same manufacturer in quantities from $50 to $5,000 on each order, and freight is paid on 100 different shipments when by a true business arrangement of a man in mercantile business the whole 100 shipments would be consolidated into one shipment and two-thirds of the cost of freight saved. While the contractor pays this freight the Government, of course, has to pay it in the end, as the cost is included in his price when he submits his bid.

The method adopted for the purchase of supplies for the Government departments in Washington has been, and is now, very crude and unbusinesslike.

There has been a little improvement over the customs in vogue a century ago, and most of it has been within a very few years.

Until during the fiscal year 1910 it was the practice for each executive department and independent establishment in Washington to issue a schedule annually, receive bids, and make contracts for supplies and services, and some of these departments would each issue several schedules, or one for each of several classes of goods or services, and prior to 1910 there were over 80 of these schedules issued annually.

The same forms were gone through of executing contracts for each of the several departments, and each contractor would have a contract for each of the departments for the same and one kind of goods.

An effort was made in January, 1894, to improve, to some extent, on the method of contracting for supplies, and a law was passed, which was approved January 27, 1894, volume 2, Supplement to the Revised Statutes, page 169. This law provided for a joint board consisting of the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury and Interior Departments and one of the Assistant Postmasters General, to be designated by the heads of those departments, respectively, the official of the Treasury Department to be the chairman of the board. The duties of this board were to carefully examine and compare all the proposals submitted and to accept or reject any or all of said proposals; providing, also, that if any or all of the proposals be rejected, advertisements for other proposals be again invited and proceeded with in the same manner.

In this provision of law it was attempted to have some supervision exercised over the purchase of supplies in the several departments of the Government. Unfortunately, however, this board was not equipped with sufficient authority, and after the examination of the awards which the several departments proceeded to make, if they found any objections to them, they could only call attention to what they regarded as irregular or unreasonable, and it was left to the discretion of the respective departments as to whether they should abide by the suggestions of this board of awards.

The board of awards, however, was not furnished with any means by which they could judge definitely as to the propriety of the awards being made as recommended, as they only had the bids and schedules of them as made by the various departments, whereas the departments when they recommended the awards had not only the bids but they had samples showing the quality of the articles upon which the bids were submitted. The board of awards could therefore only compare the prices for what appeared to them to be similar or identical articles, but they had no evidence to convince them that such was the fact. The work of this board could therefore only be regarded as merely advisory, although they labored in the manner described for 15 years without being equipped with any sufficient means or authority to accomplish results. Finally, in 1908, the three members of this board evidently became dissatisfied with the results of their labors and voluntarily undertook a plan by which all the departments could unite on one common schedule embracing all the supplies required by each of the several executive departments and independent establishments.

To undertake this, they were first compelled to get the consent of each of these executive departments. That having been done, the board proceeded to have the General Supply Committee organized, to be composed of one representative from each of the executive departments and independent establishments; and to accomplish this, each of the departments was induced to send a representative to form such committee. Upon notice from the board of awards, this committee met at the Treasury Department in June, 1908, and after forming a regular organization, which consisted of 21 members, they proceeded, under the direction of the board of awards, to prepare a general schedule of supplies which should embrace the contents of the various schedules, about 80 in all, issued annually by the various departments and branches of the Government. The aggregate number of items on all of these schedules was approximately 25,000, in which the supplies required were described and the estimated quantities stated.

The first schedule was prepared for the fiscal year 1910, and, considering the difficulties in standardization of this great variety of supplies, so that the same article would be satisfactory for the use of all of the departments, it was found to be a vast improvement over the old method of each department having separate schedules. It will be readily observed that, according to the old practice, when these departments requested proposals for supplies, each of them inserted advertisements in various newspapers, making a large number of advertisements, which in the aggregate involved a large expense. By having but one schedule on which bids were solicited only one advertisement was necessary.

Under this arrangement as to the appropriations out of which the supplies had to be purchased and on account of which the contracts were made for the different departments it was found necessary, by the advice of the Attorney General, to have the Secretary or head of each department sign every contract that was made, and the inconvenience of such a course can be readily imagined when some 300 contracts had to be passed around to 9 different executive departments, where they were examined and signed by the Secretary of each of them.

The present organization of the General Supply Committee was provided for by law, act of June 17, 1910. This provision simplified the conditions and made it obligatory upon the departments to make their purchases under the general supply contracts.

Under the provisions of this act the committee formulated specifications, solicited bids, and made contracts for all of the departments and independent establishments in the District of Columbia, and has effected an enormous saving in the expenditure of the Government funds, as will be shown by the following figures:

The total number of bids received and contracts made for the following fiscal years were:

Fiscal year.	Number of bids received.	Number of contracts made.
1910	564	282
1911	596	324
1912	746	395
1913	878	486
1914	791	420

The total amount of money saved over the previous method of purchasing supplies, in addition to the elimination of duplication of work, is estimated as follows:

1910	$188,015.00
1911	41,472.83
1912	242,198.03
1913	24,587.11

Or a total saving over the previous method of contracting supplies of $496,272.97, notwithstanding that raw materials and labor had greatly advanced during these four years and that the standard of supplies had been materially advanced.

With the idea in view of bringing about a system where there should be a central purchasing agency for standardization of supplies, this General Supply Committee was created in the act of 1910. I refer now to page 87 of the hearings as an illustration of the work which that committee has been able to do. I do not know whether members of the committee have a copy of the hearings before them, but let me refer to one or two items to show the saving that has been wrought in the people's money by the work of this committee. A table has been prepared here showing the relative price paid in different departments in the year 1906, and then we have a comparison of the prices that have been obtained by the General Supply Committee. For example, the department price for a certain grade of carbon paper per thousand sheets was $9.43. The supply committee's price was $3.40, about one-third of the amount that had theretofore been paid by the departments. For another grade of carbon paper the department's price was $9.28 and the supply committee's price was only $2.90.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILLIS. Stenographers' notebooks—the department price, 68 cents; the supply committee price, 30 cents, and so on, not to weary the committee with a long list, which I have gone over very carefully and a portion of which I shall place in the RECORD at this point.

Reduction in cost of supplies for 1914, as compared with average prices paid by executive departments in 1906 is 30–39 per cent.

The average prices, as quoted herein, paid by the different executive departments during the fiscal year 1906 were obtained from a statement taken from the Postmaster General's annual report to Congress made in 1905.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does this committee examine and report with reference to the supplies for the stationery room over in the House Office Building?

Mr. WILLIS. I regret to say it does not. I have taken pains to make a little investigation, and I am criticizing no official of the House for any malfeasance or misfeasance in office, but simply stating the facts in regard to the practice which has obtained, and I state it as a fact, which the consultation of the reports of the Clerk of the House will show beyond peradventure, that right now we are paying out of the contingent fund of the House for some articles twice as much as they are obtained for by the General Supply Committee.

For example, it appears from an examination of the report of the Clerk of the House that the House of Representatives is paying practically $4.50 per dozen for typewriter ribbons, whereas the General Supply Committee's price is $2.20 per dozen. Mimeograph match ribbons cost the House $9 a dozen, whereas the General Supply Committee's price is $2.20 per dozen. An 8-ounce pot of paste costs the General Supply Committee $1.60 per dozen, whereas it costs the House of Representatives $2.25 per dozen. Gem clips cost the House 38 cents a thousand, while they cost the General Supply Committee 25 cents per thousand. The General Supply Committee price for No. 3 pins is 29 cents per pound, while the House of Representatives has to pay 34 cents per pound. And so on through many other items. This is said not at all by way of criticism of any official of the House, but simply to call attention to the lack of economy in the present method of purchasing supplies piecemeal for governmental use. It is simply a bad business system which has obtained in the purchase of supplies.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And Members of the House are paying more for articles over here in the stationery department of the House Office Building than they would have to pay down town.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not know as to that, for I have not investigated that precise point, but I do know that the House is paying vastly more in a great many cases than is paid for the same articles as listed by the General Supply Committee. Now, that simply arises from the fact that we do not have a business system that any man who is running half a dozen drug stores, for example, would install. Suppose a man owns half a dozen drug stores in different parts of Washington. Would he maintain a system whereby he would say to a chief clerk of this store, "You buy so much of this and of that, and have it shipped," and then go to the chief clerk of another store and order him to do the same thing? Why, obviously that would be expensive; there would be a multiplication of shipping charges which would be avoided if the purchases were made by a single individual.

In bidding for furnishing supplies under the general-supply contracts the bidders have, of course, to consider the manner of delivery when they fix their prices, and at present the requirements in this respect are far from being economical.

A general purchasing office should be provided that could order in bulk for all the departments, but under the present practice the contractor receives orders for the same article from different sources in Washington, and has to make as many separate shipments. If he could combine these shipments, he could bid so as to reduce the added cost to the Government for transportation at least one-half or two-thirds, and result in a saving of many thousands of dollars to the Government.

Many contractors already complain of the great number of small orders, and in one instance the contractor reported that an article which cost the Government 25 cents he had to pay 35 cents to get it delivered from a distant city.

What we have got to do, if we want to spend economically the people's money in the purchase of supplies, is to standardize supplies, as is done by this general supply committee, and purchase, so far as practicable, through a central purchasing office. Now, I suggest to the Committee on Appropriations that it seems to me there is no work of more importance than this work which undertakes to economize with the people's money, and I believe that it would be better policy to establish a force of clerks under the control of the general supply committee—clerks who have no other duties aside from the highly technical work assigned them by the supply committee.

To attend to all this detail of work there is provided a meager force—one superintendent, at a salary of $2,000, and two clerks at a salary of $1,400—to do the work for 25 or 30 clerks.

The representatives from the different departments are all clerks of high class, all of them having intricate and responsible office duties to perform besides the time and work they devote to the work of the committee.

In assuming the business of preparing schedules and proposals, receiving bids, examining and testing samples, making awards, and having contracts properly executed for such an immense variety and quantity of supplies, the committee has a task of very large proportions, and one to which they could well devote their entire time with a corps of clerks instead of being compelled to divide their time between their respective offices in the departments and the business of the committee.

Under these conditions I learn that it has been necessary for the committee to appeal to the several departments for clerks to assist continuously, and many more clerks are necessary during the busiest time when awarding contracts.

I know that this method of procuring help has been very embarrassing to the committee, and that frequently very urgent appeals have had to be made and long delays endured before the necessary clerical help could be secured. These details of clerks have generally been for short periods, and by the time most of them became familiar with the work they were recalled and others sent in their places to be instructed in the duties.

It is impossible to carry on a work of this magnitude and importance with satisfaction and economy under such difficulties, especially if the best results are desired.

As it is now, and I state this from some personal investigation, and I know it to be a matter of fact, that the clerks who are doing work for the General Supply Committee are doing that work in addition to the work which they are performing in the various departments. Being detailed there to do that they look upon that work as a sort of side issue, and it is not possible that as good service can be obtained as might be obtained if we carried an appropriation for a proper force for the work of the General Supply Committee, and made a corresponding decrease in the force of clerks provided for the several departments.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I would like to call my friend's attention to the fact that we do carry in the deficiency bill a provision by which the supply committee is given 15 clerks for four months through the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. WILLIS. My attention had not been called to that. I thank the gentleman for the information.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. They are clerks outside of this force.

Mr. WILLIS. That is a step in the right direction, and I am very frank to say it. I note in the hearings that $23,940 was asked for, and also in the estimates, and it seems to me that it would be better, instead of having these clerks detailed, to have them permanently assigned to this work. As I understand the gentleman from South Carolina, under the legislation to which he has just referred—I understand the gentleman to say the clerks detailed from the different departments and independent establishments are still to be carried?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Fifteen clerks are allowed in the deficiency bill to try an experiment to see if it will work out——

Mr. WILLIS. I want to ask the gentleman specifically if the old system of continuing a number of clerks detailed from these bureaus and departments is still to be carried on?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. We give them 15 of these clerks through the Civil Service Commission for four months. In addition to these 15, they may also ask for details from the different departments. If that does not work well, we propose to give a larger permanent force.

Mr. WILLIS. Well, I am glad the chairman can assure us the committee have taken some step in that direction. However, I do not think it goes far enough, because it seems to me that ought to be a permanent force.

To correct the irregularities to which attention has been called a bureau of supplies should ultimately be established by proper legislative action, and a business of the magnitude and importance which this has assumed and which will largely increase should be at once placed on a business basis, with proper authority for the officer in charge to act and to act promptly.

Such a bureau should be an independent establishment, or at least to the same extent that the Government Printing Office is, and under the direction of a bureau chief appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. All this is fully provided for in House bill 4, which I have introduced and which is now pending in the Committee on Ways and Means.

The chairman says that provision is to be made for employment of these clerks for four months, and that will be some assistance; but what I am contending for is, if we are to have an efficient service, we must have a permanent force of clerks under the control of the general supply committee in order to attain the highest possible degree of efficiency——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask for two minutes more.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I am going to call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is the request of the gentleman from Ohio. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for two minutes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Is not the regular order an objection when it is called for?

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is to put the question on the amendment. The gentleman from Connecticut objects.

Mr. WILLIS. I did not hear the gentleman object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman called for the regular order, which is equal to the same thing.

Mr. WILLIS. All right. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, it has been stated that there were no objections except to the district in which we find New Orleans, and the Baltimore district, so called.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, we have had discussion enough about the regional banks. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] make a point of order? A mere objection is not sufficient.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I make a point of order. The gentleman must confine himself to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. He is not discussing the amendment to this bill, which was withdrawn.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I was accorded three minutes for discussion of this subject.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I will agree to the gentleman from Nebraska having three minutes if I can have two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] did not make request for unanimous consent, because the Chair specifically asked him if he did and he said he did not. And the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] have three minutes and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Nebraska may have three minutes and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] is recognized.

[Mr. SLOAN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to pour oil on the troubled waters of this debate, if I may. I want to express the entire satisfaction of the Missouri delegation in Congress with the action of the board in establishing regional banks. [Laughter.]

There is not, in my judgment, a single thing in the establishment of these banks that ought to lead any Member of Congress to say that these men were governed by politics. Now, take a list of these cities and run over it. Take New York and Philadelphia, one is a Democratic and one a Republican city. Take Chicago and St. Louis, and one is a Democratic and the other is a Republican city. Take Kansas City and San Francisco, and one is a Democratic and one a Republican city. Take Minneapolis and Boston, one Democratic and the other Republican. Now, these cities that did not get a bank are exactly like a sore candidate after a convention who did not get the nomination. They have gone out to find fault about it, and they charge these men with being governed by politics and improper motives. I do not believe that.

Now, what induced the commission to establish two banks in the State of Missouri? Kansas City is the gateway to the Southwest. All of the tremendous live-stock interest of Oklahoma, of southern Kansas, and of Texas passes through Kansas City on its way to Chicago, Omaha, or St. Joseph, the four great stock markets of this country. It was natural to establish a bank there. It was just as natural to put one in the great city of St. Louis. Why, do you know that all of north and west Missouri petitioned the board, if they did not establish a bank in Kansas City, to put them in the district with Chicago? And why? Because the trend of their business, the great business of those communities, was toward Chicago, and they would rather go there, because their business went there, than to St. Louis. Now, the board was up against a proposition. There was all of that southwestern live-stock trade to be taken care of. There was a part of Iowa which is tributary to Chicago, and part to Kansas City and St. Joseph; and a part of Missouri, and so with Kansas and Nebraska. The commission performed their work fairly and intelligently. There was no escape from the establishment of a bank at Kansas City in order to take care of the great interests of the Southwest; and therefore they not only satisfied the people of the State of Missouri but the people of Kansas, Nebraska, and Oklahoma as well.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the subject in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants: Chief of division, $4,000; assistant chief of division, $3,000; estimate and digest clerk, $2,500; executive clerk, $2,500; 2 principal bookkeepers, at $2,100 each; 11 bookkeepers, at $2,000 each; clerks—14 of class 4, 6 of class 3, 6 of class 2, 2 of class 1; messenger; 3 assistant messengers; messenger boy, $480; in all, $87,280.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the increase over permanent law of the salary of the Chief of the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants on page 36, line 10. The salary is $2,200 by statute. The bill carries the salary at $4,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the only law on the subject of the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants is the appropriation bill, and in the absence of a permanent law the current appropriation bill is the law in the case. This is not an increase. The salary in the current law is $4,000, and there is no permanent law anywhere creating such an office.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it the contention of the gentleman from South Carolina that there is no permanent law authorizing this appropriation, and that the mere provision in the appropriation bill would make it in order? Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] state his point of order once more?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes. On page 36, line 10, the bill carries a provision for a bookkeeper at $1,800. The statute provides for a bookkeeper at $2,200.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. What line is that on?

Mr. BARTLETT. Line 10, page 36.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the statute provides for a bookkeeper at the salary named by my colleague, but this provision is for the Chief of the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants. That is not a bookkeeper merely. The current law fixes the salary if there is no permanent act on the subject. The amount in the current law is the same as that in this bill.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to be perfectly fair, Mr. Chairman. The statute provides for a bookkeeper for this department at $2,200 a year.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman if that is the latest statute?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there are two principal bookkeepers here, at a salary of $2,100 each. The universal rule is that where a salary is not fixed by permanent law the current appropriation act governs. Certainly the Chair will not hold that a law fixing the salary of bookkeeper in the Treasury Department would be the same as a law fixing the salary of the Chief of the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants. That is not the same office at all.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I contend that the current law carried in the last bill is not the law to govern the Chair in passing on questions where a point of order is interposed against such salaries, but I am contending, Mr. Chairman, that when the statute fixes the salary it prevails over any other provision which may have been carried in the current law. Now the statute provides for a bookkeeper. That is the law. The salary fixed is $2,200, and there is no provision in the statute for any other position in this department concerning that character of work except a bookkeeper. I desire to be fair.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I have here, Mr. Chairman, the Dockery Act, section 10 of which reads as follows:

The division of warrants, estimates, and appropriations in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby recognized and established as the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants.

It does not fix any salary. That is the language used here, but no salary is fixed.

Mr. FOWLER. That is true.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It seems to me the current appropriation ought to be the controlling law in the case when the Dockery law, which established the office, did not create any salary at all.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I inquire of the gentleman from Illinois where he gets the law fixing the salary of the Chief of the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants?

Mr. FOWLER. I have already stated that the statute creating the Treasury Department and the officers therein created the office of bookkeeper at a salary of $2,200 a year.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman refer to sections 234 and 235 of the Revised Statutes?

Mr. FOWLER. That is the section.

Mr. BARTLETT. That section simply provides for two principal bookkeepers. Is that the office?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes. That is the salary provided.

Mr. BARTLETT. It provides for two principal bookkeepers at $2,100. Is that the gentleman's contention?

Mr. FOWLER. That is my contention.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is not a bookkeeper. That is the Chief of the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants. The bookkeepers are provided for on line 12 at the amount fixed in the statute.

Mr. FOWLER. What is the date of that statute?

Mr. BARTLETT. 1874. It is the Revised Statutes, section 235. Two principal bookkeepers are provided at a salary of $2,100, and this bill carries those two salaries in line 12, so that the gentleman has not shown that the statute fixes the salary of the Chief of the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants at $2,200.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] is so far mistaken in this case that——

Mr. FOWLER. Oh, I have not surrendered the floor yet.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I thought the gentleman had finished his argument.

Mr. FOWLER. I have tried to make myself clear to the Chair, and am willing to submit to his ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois make the point of order against the provision for the Chief of the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants at $4,000 on the ground that it is not authorized by law?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; in substance. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that there is a provision in the statute for a bookkeeper at $2,200, and that this provision in the bill, to all intents and purposes, for this salary is that of a bookkeeper. That is my position. I have been trying to make myself clear all the time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman was arguing the point of order, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. The usual custom is to reserve a point of order.

Mr. MANN. I wanted to ask my colleague a question about the point of order. As I understood the point of order, it was addressed against the $4,000 and not against the position itself.

Mr. FOWLER. No. I think there is an authorization for the position, to be frank with the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the gentleman from Illinois——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, in the light of the contention which was made by the honorable chairman of this subcommittee, I am rather inclined to believe that my point of order does not lie to this provision; and I want to say whenever I find I am wrong I want to get right as quick as possible, and for that reason I will withdraw my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Division of Customs: Chief of division, $4,000; assistant chief of division, $3,000; supervising tea examiners, $2,750 (transferred from Customs Service); law clerks—5 at $2,500 each, 2 at $2,000 each; clerks—5 of class 4 (2 transferred from Appointment Division), 3 of class 3, 5 of class 2 (1 transferred from Appointment Division and one from Treasurer's office), 8 of class 1 (1 transferred from Appointment Division and 1 increase), 6 at $1,000 each (1 transferred from Appointment Division); messenger; 2 assistant messengers (1 transferred from Appointment Division); in all, $64,930.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, on line 17, page 36, the bill carries a provision—

Division of Customs: Chief of division, $4,000.

The statute provides a salary of $2,200 for that position. I make the point of order against the increase of salary.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes a point of order against the provision for a chief of division, $4,000, in line 17.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] is reading from a provision of the Revised Statutes. In 1875 the Treasury Department was completely reorganized, and the provision from which the gentleman from Illinois reads has no application whatever. Section 2 of the sundry civil act of March 3, 1875, provides that on and after July 1, 1875, the organization of the Treasury Department and the several offices thereof and the annual salaries to be paid to the persons therein shall be as follows, to wit, and so forth.

The gentleman has been reading from a provision of the Revised Statutes enacted some years prior to the reorganization.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman from New York that we did not get his statement very plainly. I do not think the Chair, or anybody else in the House who was very far away from the gentleman, caught the point he was trying to make. I am sure I could not get it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I say the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] has been reading from the Revised Statutes certain compensation fixed for officials and employees in the Treasury Department. Under section 2 of the act of March 3, 1875, which was enacted subsequent to the enactment of the Revised Statutes, the Treasury Department was completely reorganized. The compensation of officials as fixed in that act supersedes the provisions of the Revised Statutes referred to by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. When does the gentleman say this act was passed—in 1875?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And what is the date of the Revised Statutes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. 1873.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. The Chair is anxious to hear this discussion, for it involves a point of order.

Mr. MANN. I am under the impression that the statutes were revised in 1878.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Published in 1878, but enacted in 1873.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York permit the Chair to ask him a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any law authorizing this appropriation; and if so, what statute is it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no statute at all providing for the Customs Division in the Treasury Department. This division supervises the expenditure of $10,750,000 annually. It has very important duties. It was first provided for in an appropriation bill. The gentleman from Illinois can eliminate it from the bill if he desires. It has been carried in this manner for years. It has been demonstrated on a previous occasion that a great many provisions in the legislative act carrying the compensation of certain officials who have been a part of the organization of the Federal Government for from 20 to 30 years can not be found in any specific statute. Because the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] can not find a specific statute designating each employee in this bill, and the specific compensation carried, he insists upon eliminating the items from the bill. The most expeditious method of transacting the business of the House is to permit these items to be eliminated here and have them restored in some other place, because no one who has any knowledge of the duties of these officials and of the functions of the various departments of the Federal Government has any notion that these positions are not to be provided for the next fiscal year.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is there any provision in the law, outside of the appropriation act, for a Chief of Division of Customs?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is not.

Mr. FOWLER. Why, certainly there is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There was none for the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants.

Mr. MANN. I understand that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The act of March, 1875, provided for a chief of division of bookkeeping, estimates, and appropriations. The report of the Dockery Commission very materially modified the activities and functions of the various offices in the Treasury Department, as the gentleman very well knows, and it recognized and established in place of the division of bookkeeping, estimates, and appropriations the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants. It probably is the most important division in that service.

Mr. MANN. I know, but I am asking now about the Division of Customs. We have passed the Division of Warrants and Bookkeeping.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no statutory provision. The division was created, as these divisions are usually created, in this way: Certain clerks and employees are found in some bureau performing certain services. As the work develops it becomes important and essential to proper administration that those employees be segregated into a separate force, and from time to time provision is made for a division to control certain functions and perform certain duties. That is the only authority to be found anywhere for establishing many of the divisions. After they have gone along for 20 or 30 years, some gentleman finds that there is no statute specifically providing for a certain division, and for that reason he wishes to eliminate the places from the bill and emasculate the public service.

Mr. MANN. Here is a case in point: We have recently passed a tariff bill, and there has been one on the statute books all the time requiring the collection of customs dues. Many of these places are not under positive requirements of law; but can there be any possible question about our authority to make an appropriation for a place necessary in order to enforce the tariff law which we have on the statute books? Is not this a part of that work? We put a certain duty upon the Secretary of the Treasury—to collect the customs.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think perhaps under the rule we have established some of these things that are absolutely essential are not perhaps strictly in order on these bills.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will remember the Prince-Hardwick filibuster, or whatever they choose to call it; the attack made upon the legislative appropriation bill years ago; when they reduced this bill to a skeleton; but I think the rulings then made have been overruled many times since. They have not been followed.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. That is not my contention at all.

Mr. MANN. I understand that is not my colleague's contention.

Mr. FOWLER. I am not interposing a point of order against this position at all, because there is authority for it under the statute, and the statute fixes the salary at $2,200.

Mr. MANN. What is the provision of law in reference to this place? My colleague says that this salary is $2,200. If he has the provision of law, I wish he would give it to us.

Mr. FOWLER. No; I have not the provision of law here. It is in the Annotated Statutes of the United States, in 10 volumes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But that has been superseded.

Mr. FOWLER. No; it has not been superseded. It is revised down to 1909, and if there was any change the great writers would have found it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the great writers have not found it. I have the act of 1875, and it provides for seven chiefs of department at $2,800 instead of $2,200.

Mr. FOWLER. I say that the statute provides $2,200 for this position.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The act of 1875 provides for seven chiefs of division at $2,800, eight chiefs of division at $2,400, and there are no $2,200 chiefs of division in the Treasury Department. It supersedes the provisions in the Revised Statutes.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman say that the act of 1875 supersedes the statute with reference to this officer?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; because I do not admit that the chief of division is incorporated in any specific section. The chief of this division has been established since that time.

Mr. FOWLER. Oh, no; customs is almost as old as the Government.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, we are wasting time; let this matter go out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order against what?

Mr. FOWLER. I make the point of order against the increase of salary referred to from $2,200 to $4,000.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been shown to the Chair that there is no statute authorizing the appropriation for this position. If the gentleman makes the point of order on the ground that it is not authorized, the Chair will sustain the point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. I think it is authorized by law. I think this position is as clearly established in the Treasury Department as is the office of Solicitor General.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the gentleman's point of order.

Mr. MANN. But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois did not make a point of order against the position.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois made it against the increase, and an increase from nothing to $4,000 is an increase.

Mr. MANN. As I understood my colleague, he did not make the point of order against the position, but against the salary.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman from Illinois make a point of order against the position or the salary?

Mr. FOWLER. Against the salary, the increase of salary.

The CHAIRMAN. If a point of order is made against the salary, the Chair will sustain it.

Mr. MANN. But, Mr. Chairman, the salary is the same as the salary under the current law. The ruling of the Chair has always been, unless the Chair finds the salary is fixed——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that there was no law authorizing this appropriation whatever; that there is no statute authorizing the appropriation.

Mr. MANN. Suppose we admit that, as a matter of argument, there is such a place. The salary is fixed in the current law at $4,000. The ruling has always been that where the salary was not fixed by law and the place was carried at all, then the salary in the current law was to be treated as the legal salary. That has always been the rule. Of course, if the Chair sustains the contention of my colleague, that the salary is fixed at $2,200, the Chair would sustain the point of order; but the Chair, as I understood, indicated that there was no salary fixed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised by the parliamentary clerk that the gentleman from Illinois is correct, and if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] only makes the point of order against the salary, the point of order is overruled.

Mr. FOWLER. If the point of order is to be sustained, the whole salary would go out.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to ask a question in reference to the form of the bill. A few years ago the distinguished Committee on Appropriations inaugurated a very sensible reform by shortening up the bill through printing the amounts in figures instead of words. I notice now that they have considerably lengthened the bill by inserting parenthetical phrases of value to the House for information, which take up a great deal of space in the bill. "Transferred from the Customs Service" is one. In this paragraph there are five of these parenthetical phrases. Does the gentleman desire to have those carried into the engrossed bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. That was done in order that the committee might keep track of them in the next appropriation bill, when they will come back and ask for a smaller number of clerks or an additional number of clerks, and this will enable us to keep track of where these clerks came from.

Mr. MANN. I think the committee might have some other way of keeping track of the information. It is a nuisance to me in the law in comparing these bills, but if the committee thinks it is essential to have the information before it in this way, very well. I could keep it more conveniently in a report than in the law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It saves a great deal of time, because Members see at a glance the information, and it drops out next year; it is only carried one year.

The Clerk read as follows:

Division of Appointments: Chief of division, $3,000; assistant chief of division, $2,000; executive clerk, $2,000; clerks—1 of class 4 (2 transferred to Customs Division), 4 of class 3, 4 of class 2 (1 transferred to Customs Division), 2 of class 1 (1 transferred to Customs Division, 2 to Surety Bond Section, and 1 omitted), 2 at $1,000 each (1 transferred to Customs Division and 1 to Surety Bond Section), 1 $900; messenger; 1 assistant messenger (1 transferred to Customs Division); in all, $27,660.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order, on page 37, line 3, where the bill carries a provision of appointment—chief, $3,000. I make the point of order against the provision because it is not authorized by law and it is an increase.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any law authorizing this provision?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It is just like the provision we passed a moment ago; there is no law fixing the salary of this particular chief of division.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any law creating the position?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Except the appropriation in the current law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order against the provision for the chief of division at $3,000?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section of Surety Bonds: Chief of section, $2,000 (in lieu of law and bond clerk, transferred from Division of Appointments); clerks—2 of class 1 (transferred from Division of Appointments), 1 at $1,000 (transferred from Division of Appointments); 1 assistant messenger (transferred from office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue); in all, $6,120.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. What is the point of order?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, my understanding is that that is new legislation.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Oh, no; I think my friend from Iowa is laboring under a misapprehension. That particular division was not intended to take care of what was suggested as a Government bonding scheme. That is a division that has charge of the bonds of contractors, men who are erecting public buildings or who have contracts for deepening harbors or rivers.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Does this contemplate any new work at all?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Oh, no. It is just simply a division that takes care of the bonds that are given to the Government by contractors.

Mr. MOORE. It does not involve the question of the Government taking over the surety business?

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, no. It has not the slightest reference to that.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. None in the world.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman is aware that there is a question coming up shortly with respect to the bonding of Government employees?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. There was such a bill before our committee, but this has nothing to do with that. This division in the Treasury Department deals with the bonds of people who are erecting public buildings or deepening harbors or who are engaged in Government work requiring bonds.

Mr. MOORE. And pertains only to current business?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. CALDER. It has nothing whatever to do with the matter to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania refers.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, what is the necessity for creating this section as a separate section in the Division of Appointments? I take it that this is to be created as a part of the Division of Appointments?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois, the law clearly devolves upon the Treasury Department certain duties in regard to the examination of bonds.

Mr. MANN. I understand all of that; but what I was trying to get at is the reason for now differentiating this from the rest of the Division of Appointments.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Because it is totally foreign to the duties ordinarily performed in the office of the appointment clerk.

Mr. MANN. I take it that this remains under the division of appointments, does it not?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It is a separate section, the gentleman understands.

Mr. MANN. Then I am utterly opposed to creating a section with a new title in the Treasury Department. We have divisions in the Treasury Department. Why is it proposed to create a section, to be on the same plane as a division? We have the Division of Bookkeeping, a Division of Customs, a Division of Appointments, a Division of Public Moneys, a Division of Loans and Currency, a Division of Revenue-Cutter Service, a Division of Printing and Stationery, and so forth.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I think it is stated that only about 6 per cent of the bonds that this division handles are the bonds that appointees of the Government give. They are dealing with bonds given by people who have contracts to perform work for the Government.

Mr. MANN. If you are going to create a separate division, why do you not call it a division instead of a section?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. If we called it a division, it would mean that the men at the head of it would have three or four thousand dollars a year instead of $2,000 a year.

Mr. MANN. He will have that, anyway.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Oh, no. Let us not cross that bridge until we get to it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; the bridge is right here. I am unwilling to destroy euphony in language by stating that in the Treasury Department you have a large number of divisions, and that then you propose to take out of one of those divisions a portion of it and create a new division and then call it something else.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. What would the gentleman suggest calling it?

Mr. MANN. If it is to be a new division, call it a division of surety bonds.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. If the gentleman will move to strike out the word "section," on line 13, page 37, I see no objection to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman sees the reason for it.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It is purely an administrative matter, and I am following the suggestion of the men at the Treasury Department who have it in charge.

Mr. MANN. I would have taken it that they were creating a section in the Division of Appointments, but if the purpose is to have this entirely separate from the Division of Appointments, then I think we ought to say so, and if it is not, I do not see any necessity for creating it at all.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I think it is entirely separate from the Division of Appointments.

Mr. MANN. Then we better make it a division. I withdraw the point of order. I will test the sense of the committee and I move to strike out the word "section" and insert the word "division."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 37, line 13, by striking out the word "section," at the beginning of the line, and inserting the word "division."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. I now move to insert the word "division" for "section," where it appears the second time in the same line.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 37, line 13, by striking out the word "section," after the word "of," and inserting the word "division."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the preceding paragraph the word "division" wherever the word "section" occurs.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that in the previous section the word "division" be substituted for the word "section" wherever it occurs. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Division of Public Moneys: Chief of division, $3,000; assistant chief of division, $2,000; clerks—5 of class 4, 4 of class 3, 4 of class 2, 1 of class 1, 1, $1,000; messenger; assistant messenger; in all, $29,760.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order—page 37, line 20—against "chief of division, $3,000," an increase of salary over statutory law.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any statute authorizing this?

Mr. BARTLETT. There is a statute authorizing a chief of division, Mr. Chairman, but the salary is not $3.000. Does the gentleman make a point of order against the salary and position or against the salary?

Mr. FOWLER. It would all have to go out.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not know.

Mr. FOWLER. Oh, yes; that is the ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not informed about what the gentleman from Illinois made a point of order. The Chair desires the gentleman to state upon what grounds he makes the point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. I did, but the chairman may not have heard me. On page 37, line 20, the bill carries a provision for a division of public moneys—chief of division, $3,000. I make the point of order against the chief of division, because it is a proposition to increase the salary of this position above that which is fixed by statutory law.

Mr. BARTLETT. Do I understand the gentleman to make the point of order against the salary?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois states he made the point of order against the chief of division, because it increases the salary, but he did not say anything about the $3,000.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest that if the gentleman looks at the RECORD he will see his language did not include——

Mr. FOWLER. I stated, in the first instance, that it carried a provision for a salary of $3,000.

The CHAIRMAN. May the Chair ask the gentleman in charge of the bill whether or not there is any law authorizing this salary of $3,000?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. No; the situation is this: There is no law fixing this particular office. The law authorizes certain chiefs of division; and we are carrying this salary in the current appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained; and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Division of Loans and Currency: Chief of division, $3,500; assistant chief of division, $2,700; custodian of paper, $2,250; bond and interest clerk, $2,000; clerks, 6 of class 4, 5 of class 3, 5 of class 2, 5 of class 1, 1, $1,000, 21 at $900 each (3 transferred from register's office); assorter of bonds, $800; 12 expert money counters, at $720 each; messenger; 3 assistant messengers; 11 laborers (1 transferred from Treasurer's office, 1 from register's office, and 1 from office of Auditor for War Department); machine operator, $840; in all, $82,690.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, page 37, line 24, the bill carries a provision for a division of loans and currency, chief of division, $3,500. The statute provides for a salary of $2,200. I make the point of order against the office of chief of division.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. And not against the salary?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make a point of order against chief of division?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any authorization for a chief of division?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes, sir; there is a law for a chief of division.

Mr. BARTLETT. There are five chiefs of division provided for—section 235 of the Revised Statutes—in the Treasury Department and seven heads of division. It says that there shall be in the Treasurer's office so many officers, and among those five chiefs of division.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is fairly familiar with this act creating this division, and the Chair will again ask the gentleman from Illinois if he correctly understood that he makes the point of order against the words, "chief of division"?

Mr. FOWLER. I make the point of order against the position, "chief of division," because there is an effort on the part of the bill to increase the salary of this position from $2,200 to $3,500 against the plain provision of permanent law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair may be at fault, but he can not understand the gentleman from Illinois, and he asks him again if he will please state whether or not he makes the point of order against the $3,500 or merely against the words, "chief of division"?

Mr. FOWLER. I make the point of order against the position itself at $3,500.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. GOULDEN. I wish to ask the gentleman from South Carolina a question, and that is if the salary of the chief of the division is only $2,200, how does the gentleman account for the fact that the salary of the assistant chief of division is $2,700 under the existing law?

Mr. FOWLER. That is the anomaly of this whole affair.

Mr. GOULDEN. I ask that question, because it seems to me to be contradictory terms that a chief of division should have only $2,200, as provided under existing law, whereas the assistant chief receives $2,700?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that the chief of division has been carried at this salary for 20 years or more, in spite of what the gentleman from Illinois says. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman from Illinois is continually undertaking to say to the committee that this committee is undertaking to increase these salaries, when, as a matter of fact, they have been carried at these figures since 1875, and the gentleman from Illinois is far from stating the fact when he undertakes to say this committee has sought to increase salaries.

Mr. GOULDEN. But he seems to succeed in having points of order sustained. Why?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. He does so because, as a matter of fact, the position itself, back in 1875, was created at a salary of $2,200, but the appropriation bills have since then been carrying it——

Mr. GOULDEN. At what figure?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Three thousand five hundred dollars, as I understand.

Mr. GOULDEN. And that will account for the difference between the assistant chief of division and the chief of division. I simply wanted to get that apparent contradiction explained.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Supervising Architect: Supervising Architect, $5,000; executive officer, $3,250; technical officer, $3,000; drafting division—superintendent, $3,000, assistant superintendent, $2,750; superintendent, computing division, $2,750; mechanical engineering division—superintendent, $2,750, assistant superintendent, $2,400; structural division—superintendent, $2,750, assistant superintendent, $2,400; superintendent, repairs division, $2,400; superintendent, accounts division, $2,500; superintendent, maintenance division, $2,500; files and records division—chief, $2,500, assistant chief, $2,250; head draftsman, $2,500; administrative clerks—8 at $2,000 each; technical clerks—4 at $1,800 each; clerks—9 of class 4, additional to 1 of class 4 as bookkeeper $100, 4 at $1,700 each, 14 of class 3, 6 at $1,500 each, 13 of class 2, 8 at $1,300 each, 21 of class 1, 4 at $1,100 each, 7 at $1,000 each, 3 at $900 each, 2 at $840 each; photographer, $2,000; foreman, duplicating galley, $1,800; two duplicating paper chemists at $1,200 each; foreman, vault, safe, and lock shop, $1,100; 5 messengers; 2 assistant messengers; messenger boys—3 at $480 each; 2 at $360 each; skilled laborers—4 at $1,000 each, 7 at $960 each, 1 $900, 1 $840; laborers—1 $660, 1 $600; in all $220,800.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the position of Supervising Architect, on page 39, line 2, for the reason that the bill carries an appropriation for $5,000 whereas the statute provides for a salary of $4,500.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the chairman of the committee advise the Chair what the statute is on that? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] makes the point of order on lines 21 and 22 against the Supervising Architect at $5,000, on the ground that the law authorizes only $4,500.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Four thousand five hundred dollars is the sum fixed by law.

Mr. BARTLETT. Wait a minute. It says "one Supervising Architect at $5,000, according to the act of March 3, 1875." It is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I feel sure that I ran down the law on this salary correctly, and I did so in the annotated statute, where all the law is compiled upon that subject, and the salary as given by the annotated statute is $4,500.

Mr. BARTLETT. The Revised Statute was published in 1878, which codifies the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair ought to know the law.

Mr. BARTLETT. The Chair can not carry all these salaries in his head, and he is not expected to do it. No lawyer or Member of Congress can do so. It would be a remarkable thing for anybody to do it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the statutory salary of Supervising Architect is $4,500 a year. He does not receive $5,000 a year, but he receives $6,000. Five thousand dollars are carried in the legislative bill and $1,000 are paid out of the appropriation made in the sundry civil bill. That is the compensation he has received for about eight years.

The CHAIRMAN. If I understand, the chairman of the committee admits that the law authorizes only $4,500.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have no fault to find with the salary of the Supervising Architect whatever. If anything, it is too small. That is the only trouble about it, to my mind. To secure a first-class, competent architect you have to pay as high as $10,000, or more. I want to ask whether in the hearings before the committee it developed how far this department was behind in its work. I am told they are four years or more behind; that it would require four or five years for them to bring the present authorizations of public buildings up to date. I want to know if that is true; and if so, why?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. That is a question that comes out from the committee having charge of the sundry civil bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN] will permit, if he will examine his mail of the last month or so, he will find a circular letter issued by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, under whom the Supervising Architect is, in which he gives a detailed statement of the condition of the work and how much they are behind. I have one of those circulars on my desk. I have that and the letter written to me in response to my visit to the office in reference to certain buildings authorized in my own district.

Mr. GOULDEN. How far are they behind, may I inquire of the gentleman?

Mr. BARTLETT. Not less than three years.

Mr. GOULDEN. I have no public building at this time, but I expect to have one in connection with my colleague [Mr. BRUCKNER] some day soon. I want to get in line so that I know we will get that public building within 5 or 10 years from the time it is authorized by Congress.

Mr. CANTRILL. If the gentleman from New York will permit me, I want to say that the department is five years behind.

Mr. GOULDEN. Five years? I understood it was several years behind, but the committee tells me it is from three to four years. So I think it behooves my colleague from the twenty-second New York district and myself to get busy and secure an appropriation, and then hope to have the building in five years by persistent effort here at Washington.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Congress has authorized buildings in excess of the capacity of that office to turn them out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to continue for five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma). Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Congress has passed acts authorizing public buildings, and did so with the knowledge that the office at the time of the last public-building act was three years behind and there was no prospect of catching up with its work.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the distinguished chairman pardon a question which I would like to have answered? Is the force sufficiently large in this department under the Supervising Architect to enable him to do his work?

Mr. BARTLETT. All he ought to do; yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, it depends on what the gentleman means when he asks if the force is sufficiently large to do its work. If the gentleman means if the force is sufficiently large to prepare plans for all the public buildings authorized in one year, it is not, nor in two years. The office is organized and equipped to turn out about $14,000,000 of public buildings a year. It was organized at that rate three or four years ago, when it was believed that that was all that the Government could afford to expend annually for the construction of public buildings. In view of the present condition of the Treasury, if we could afford to spend three or four million dollars three or four years ago, we ought to cut the expense down materially, because at the rate of expenditure to-day and the proposed rate for the next fiscal year it is apparent that the amount of money available will be so much less that the Government will not be able to afford nearly that much for public buildings without incurring a very considerable deficit.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have no criticism to make on the Supervising Architect, but I wanted to know whether he was within three or four years of being up to date with the plans that were authorized for public buildings by Congress.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN] yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. GOULDEN. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I want to ask a question of the chairman of the committee. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations was evidently talking about the office of the Supervising Architect in the Treasury Department.

Mr. GOULDEN. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Down in my district, in Oklahoma City, we have an appropriation of $32,000, passed two years ago. We have a public building there that is insufficient to house the Federal officials. We have abolished a couple of land offices and transferred the headquarters of the United States court to Oklahoma City, and the Government is paying out at that place something like two or three thousand dollars a year at this time for rent, and we have been unable to get the Supervising Architect's Office in the Treasury Department to make this addition down there because there is no money to employ assistants to make the plans. That has been going on for two years.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That statement was made, no doubt, to the gentleman by the Treasury officials, but it is inaccurate.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I think the chairman is inaccurate about that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I am not inaccurate. I know whereof I speak. The gentleman has a case where there is an emergency, where an addition has been authorized to the building because of peculiar conditions existing in the public service, a congestion and concentration which will increase the necessities of the public service from those contemplated when the building was erected. The department takes the position in a situation of that character that it will not have the plans prepared for that addition until the project is reached in a certain order, but there is nothing to prevent the department, if the emergency exists and is of such a character as should be attended to at once, from putting those plans in preparation by the force it has.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. In a moment. The department officials said they would take this up in its order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is the attitude assumed by the department, but my contention is that when an emergency exists the department ought to exercise ordinary common sense to relieve a situation like that, rather than wait until a number of other buildings that are not quite so necessary from the standpoint of the immediate transaction of business have been started. That is a controversy that has continued for some time.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma). The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN] has expired.

Mr. MAPES. I desire to take the floor in my own right.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to a few facts in regard to the work of the Supervising Architect's Office. The question of the gentleman from New York is answered very definitely in the hearings—page 106—by the Supervising Architect. It appears from the hearings that the office is behind from five to six years in its work. It takes between three and four years from the time a building is authorized before the Supervising Architect's Office can even begin to prepare the plans, and it takes about six years from the authorization of the building before the building is completed.

The appropriations for this office for the last few years furnish a striking illustration of the evil effects upon the public service of penny-wise and pound-foolish economy. The appropriation bill passed in 1911, after our friends on the other side of the aisle got control of the House, reduced the number of employees in the Supervising Architect's Office by 66, in spite of the fact that the work of the office was far behind, the number of public buildings authorized was steadily increasing, and the work of the office was getting more and more behind as time went on. The inauguration of the parcel post made it necessary to enlarge old post-office buildings and to build new ones. The Architect's force should have been increased instead of decreased.

Since that time the office has continued to get more and more behind in its work, until now it is practically six years behind. If no other public buildings were authorized, it would take six years for that office to catch up with the work already assigned to it. It takes from three to four years from the time a public building is authorized by Congress before the Supervising Architect's Office can even commence to give any consideration to the plans for it.

The Supervising Architect, in the hearings before this committee, on page 106, says:

> The public-buildings act approved March 4, 1913, gave us about four years' work at our present rate of progress. We will not commence work on that bill for one and a half or two years. You might say that we have five and one-half or six years work ahead of us.

Again, he says:

> That at our present rate of progress it will not be until the beginning of the calendar year of 1916 that we will commence work on the public buildings act, approved March 4, 1913.

In spite of this condition of affairs, Congress continues to neglect to provide the Supervising Architect's Office with any adequate appropriation to take care of the work now on hand, although there has been a little start in the right direction in this bill. I am afraid, however, that the increase provided for in this bill will prove entirely inadequate.

The Supervising Architect again, on page 107, says:

> We find that our clerical force available for the administrative work incident to the construction of new buildings is not in balance with the technical force. * * * It seems unwise to have so many buildings under construction when we are unable to handle the enormous correspondence and administrative work which naturally follows. Letters accumulate for two or three weeks before they receive attention and the work of construction is delayed: there is complaint all along the line, and we are criticized on the floor of the House. However, it is a condition that we can not ameliorate under existing circumstances unless you can help us by this balancing of the force.

There is not a man here who would tolerate a system in his private business that made it necessary to hold up the progress of building operations for two to three weeks, as testified to by the Supervising Architect, on account of not having enough help to answer the correspondence promptly. It is unbusinesslike and wasteful in the extreme to allow such a condition of affairs to exist.

New buildings are constantly being authorized, and the hope held out to the local communities that they are soon to have a new Federal building, but the local community becomes discouraged and disheartened before the building is started after it is authorized.

The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], in a speech on the floor of the House on February 20 of this year, page 3728 of the RECORD, corroborates the statement of the Supervising Architect. He said that—

For the past 12 years there has been a steady increase in the authorizations for public buildings, and for the last three or four years there has been a steady decrease in the output of buildings from the Office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury. This decrease in the output began in 1911, when a reduced appropriation made it necessary to dispense with 75 of the 432 employees. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, the output was 101 buildings; for 1912, it fell to 82; for 1913, it fell to 77; and the estimate for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, is only 70 buildings.

He continues:

There is probably not a Member upon this floor who has been here for six years or more, unless he represents a district in one of our large cities, who has not a building authorized for his district which has been pending for three or four years and which to-day appears no nearer being built than it did the day the bill which provided for it passed Congress. Under the methods obtaining, after a building is authorized the patience of the community is worn threadbare before construction on the foundation is begun. In one place in my district, where I secured an authorization for a post-office building, some of the older inhabitants are beginning to date things back to "the time when CLARK got a building for us," and yet not a shovel of dirt has been thrown toward preparing for the foundation.

I do not know how far back into ancient history the act was passed authorizing the public building in his district to which the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds refers, but he has described a situation that exists all over the country, and yet the Supervising Architect's Office is obliged to get along with an inadequate force. The work continues to pile up and the public service continues to suffer.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. Do you find anywhere in the hearings that they are asking for an increased force? If not, somebody is to blame other than the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MAPES. They asked for an additional force and an additional appropriation of about $8,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MAPES. I do.

Mr. MANN. Considering the fact that the House has just stricken out, at the suggestion of my colleague from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER], the authorization for the Supervising Architect, does the gentleman think they would be authorized to ask for an increase? Here they come before the House and we cut out the place and the salary both.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. The suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois is very pertinent. The appropriation should be increased, not stricken out or diminished. In answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], the difficulty is not that they have too many supervisors, but that they have not enough, as the testimony of the Supervising Architect shows. The difficulty is that they have not enough technical men—draftsmen—in the office to take care of the work of the office.

Mr. MURDOCK. But they have sufficient subordinates? Is that it?

Mr. MAPES. No; they have not a sufficient force anywhere, and they are particularly short of technical men.

Mr. MURDOCK. It is a fact that that office is away behind in its work?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. And the Office of the Supervising Architect puts the blame upon the fact that the office has not enough help. Is that true?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the committee say that that office has not enough help?

Mr. MAPES. I do not know what the committee says.

As I understand it, the committee have provided for the "balancing of the force," which the Supervising Architect speaks of in his testimony; but in my opinion the technical force of the office is still left altogether inadequate to do the work that is immediately pressing for buildings in different localities.

I desire to direct particular attention to the condition of the office at Holland, Mich., in my district. There was a building authorized for that city in June, 1910, and the contract has not yet been let. The situation there is one of the most urgent that can well be imagined. I am informed by the Supervising Architect that the contract will be let early this summer, but it is an outrage that the people of Holland have been compelled to wait all this time for no other reason than because of an inadequate force in the Architect's Office.

The city of Holland had a population, according to the 1910 census, of 10,490, which has been rapidly increasing. It is a thriving, prosperous community. The postmaster of that office has furnished me with some interesting figures on the business done by his office. The postal receipts of the Holland office in 1900 were $12,103; in 1913 they were $37,222; and an item in their local paper, the Holland City News, which reached me this morning, shows that the receipts for the year ending March 31, 1914, are over $40,000, making it a first-class office. It will be seen that the receipts of the office have nearly tripled since 1900.

The total weight of the second-class mail matter alone handled by that office in 1913 was 173,966 pounds.

MONEY ORDERS.

The figures for the past three years, ending severally on June 30, show the following:

Year.	Domestic orders.		International orders.
	Issued.	Paid.	Issued.	Paid.
1911	13,170	9,554	466	54
1912	15,811	10,083	482	57
1913	17,520	11,364	573	68

This business has all been done in a building with only 1,693 square feet of floor space. Anyone familiar with the postal business will realize the total inadequacy of a building with only that amount of floor space to do a postal business where the receipts amount to over $40,000 per year.

The postmaster has no private office. He has a small desk in the room where the carriers distribute and sort out the mail. There are often from 20 to 25 men at a time in this one small room sorting over the mail.

As I said before, we expect the contract for the Holland office to be let in a short time, so that any increase in the appropriation in this bill will not affect us. But here is a situation in the Supervising Architect's Office that needs the careful consideration of this committee and of Congress. This office should have help enough to enable it to keep up with its work. As it is now, so many years elapse between the time a building is authorized and the time when it is finally completed that in many growing communities the building is totally inadequate to take care of the business before it is completed.

I will print as a part of my remarks the article on the Holland post office from the Holland City News of April 2, 1914:

HOLLAND POST OFFICE IN FIRST CLASS—HOLLAND POST-OFFICE RECEIPTS FOR YEAR PAST IN EXCESS OF $40,000—THE CHANGE IN DIVISION WILL NOT BE MADE UNTIL THE 1ST OF JULY.

After July 1 the Holland post office will be in the first class division; at least, the receipts of the local office during the year ended Tuesday were such that the local office is warranted to expect that the Government will boost it to first class. The receipts during the year past have been more than ever before in the history of Holland. For some years past the office has been gradually climbing to a total of $40,000, receipts necessary in order to make it eligible to be raised into the new division, and an examination of the office's books for the year just past, made to-day, show that this time there is a safe margin in excess of $40,000.

The National Post Office Department at Washington takes three months, from April 1 to July 1, to audit the accounts of the various post offices, and hence the change will not be announced until that time.

The parcel-post business during the past year has been a considerable one, and the receipts from this part of the business have materially helped to bring the total amount up to the required mark. But aside from the parcel post, the receipts have been very satisfactory during the 12 months just closed.

After July 1 Holland will be in the highest class that any post office can be in. It will be in a class with Grand Rapids and all the larger cities. In the first class there are again various grades, and of course the larger the receipts the higher the grade.

The Holland post office has experienced a remarkable growth during the past decade. Most people do not realize how fast the growth has been, but the figures show that the increase in annual receipts has been very large. The working force has kept pace with the increase in business, and new employees are constantly being added.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I want to make one or two observations along the line suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. We all know that the Supervising Architect's Office is very far behind in the construction of public buildings. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] has made a point of order against the item, "Supervising Architect, at $5,000," which strikes out the item entirely, and so far as this House is concerned, abolishes the office. And from the fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] made this point of order and did not follow it up with an amendment making the salary $4,500, we have the right to assume that it is his view that this office should be entirely abolished. We all know that if it is abolished, instead of the department being five years behind in the construction of public buildings, it will be much further behind in the future.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the gentleman that the committee has charge of offering these amendments.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not yield further.

Mr. FOWLER. If the gentleman desires to have this position maintained, why does he not offer an amendment?

Mr. LENROOT. I am very glad to answer the gentleman, Mr. Chairman. Every member of this committee except possibly the gentleman from Illinois knows that his point of order amounts to absolutely nothing, and that this will be restored in another place, and that the time that is being consumed in raising these points of order is merely wasted time of this House. [Applause.] If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] believes he is accomplishing anything by making this point of order striking out this item, it is his duty to offer an amendment making the salary $4,500, because all of the rest of us know, even if he does not, that the item will be restored in another place.

Mr. Chairman, we have spent some three hours this afternoon upon this bill and we have read some four pages of it; anyone sitting in the gallery watching the proceedings of this committee must come to the conclusion that this is the most inefficient body upon earth. We talk about the departments doing business in a businesslike way. We ourselves ought to demonstrate that we are capable of doing business in a businesslike way instead of wasting time upon such matters as this, when legislation of the greatest importance to the country is pending and awaiting consideration.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MURDOCK. What was that amendment?

Mr. LENROOT. To strike out the last two words.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is a very astute and adroit politician. He is just as astute and adroit on the floor of this House as he is back in Wisconsin. The criticism that the gentleman makes because of points of order imposed in this bill against irregularities stamps him as indorsing every irregularity in the bill. It stamps him as against the labor of his own district, where this bill discriminates against labor.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. No.

Mr. LENROOT. I yielded to the gentleman.

Mr. FOWLER. No; not now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FOWLER. It stamps him as being against the labor not only of his own district and his own State, but it stamps him as being against the labor of the world.

Mr. LENROOT. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. I know that the committee, in making a discrimination against labor, did it perhaps without being advised, because they said so, and I took their word for it; but the gentleman has been advised about it by the discussion on the floor of this House, and he stands here now to indorse a policy against the laboring people of this country and a policy of high salaries, readily increased, for those who stand at the top. He stands for salaries for charwomen of $240 a year, salaries fixed more than three-quarters of a century ago. He stands for increasing the salaries of men who are receiving $5,000 a year to $6,000 a year or $10,000 a year, one increase at $4,000 a clip. He is an exceedingly illuminating gentleman, here on the floor of this House, and I should not wonder if he used some of the same tactics back in his district to get votes.

Mr. LENROOT. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LENROOT. I merely want to assist the gentleman.

Mr. FOWLER. I yield for a question.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to assist the gentleman by admitting all the charges that he makes so far as the points of order he has raised this afternoon are concerned, and to say that I indorse the action of the Committee on Appropriations in every case.

Mr. FOWLER. I yielded for a question, not for a speech. The gentleman uses his usual ingenious tactics of evading the issue, and by some kind of secret legerdemain, peculiar to him and no other man on the floor of this House, turning and evading the issue. Ah, but it will not do the gentleman any good. When you go back to your constituency, tell them the truth, that you stood here for the purpose of increasing big men's salaries, and that you stood against the increase of the low men's salaries, and that you stood not only for refusing to increase the poor man's salary but for the reduction of their salary as fixed by law. Now go back and tell the truth.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois has repeatedly made the statement on the floor of this House during the consideration of this bill that the bill undertakes to raise salaries and increase salaries of those in the higher positions, and that it discriminates in favor of those holding the higher positions and against those who receive the lower salaries. Mr. Chairman, that statement is not borne out by the facts. The gentleman says that he has enlightened the gentleman from Wisconsin and other members of the committee as to this bill. We have endeavored to show the gentleman, and the statement has been made to him time and again, that this bill does not seek to increase the salaries of those receiving the larger salaries, but he persists in his seeming endeavor to put the committee in a wrong light. The bill carries the same amount that it carried last year and the year before and the year before that. There is no discrimination so far as this bill is concerned. The gentleman is anxious for the country to believe and for the people in his district to believe that he is the great champion of labor on the floor of the House, but I am satisfied that when the people of his district read this RECORD they will see the evident motive of the gentleman in making these repeated points of order and these repeated insinuations against the committee which prepared this bill.

Now, the gentleman made a point of order against several chiefs of divisions. They have gone out, and, as the gentleman from Wisconsin wisely said, it is assumed that the gentleman from Illinois desires that these positions be eliminated and not restored, because he did not offer an amendment seeking to restore them.

Mr. FOWLER. I will ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that when a position has been taken out of the bill on a point of order it has not been the practice to restore it to the statutory salary by amendment by the chairman of the committee?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It may have been done in some instances; but if the gentleman makes the point of order he stands before the country in the attitude of not wanting this particular position filled, and if he does want it restored at the salary fixed by statute it is his duty to offer an amendment and have it adopted. There is not a member of the committee who does not know, as a matter of fact, that these positions will be restored in another place. As the gentleman from Wisconsin says, we have wasted over three hours of time in listening to points of order and having points of order made by the gentleman from Illinois passed upon when he knows, or he ought to know, that it is a mere waste of time on the part of the House, and that they will be restored to the bill, because the Supervising Architect's office can not be carried on without some one at the head of it. I protest against this waste of public time in order to make capital back home.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, on page 39, I move to insert the words "Supervising Architect, $4,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 39, lines 21 and 22, insert "Supervising Architect, $4,500."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] will ever fully recover from the attack made upon him, but he is the first one that ever got results out of my colleague from Illinois. [Laughter.]

I sympathize with my distinguished colleague from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER]. He says that this bill is made up in the interest of the plutocrats, in effect, and against labor. He charges the committee with bringing in propositions to increase the salary for those who receive the higher salaries and refuse to appropriate to the limit where the law provides for salaries of laboring people. He charges this on the committee, but, Mr. Chairman, back of the committee, we have recently learned, stands the Democratic President and the Democratic administration.

We have learned in the last few days that the committees of the House, and the Members of the House in the main on the Democratic side, including my colleague, take orders from the White House and from the Democratic administration. Every item in this bill where there is an increase proposed has been recommended by the Democratic administration; and every item in the bill where the gentleman is proposing an increase, as he says, for labor, that increase has not been proposed by the Democratic administration. So that if my colleague is correct his charges do not go merely to the Committee on Appropriations. My colleague who the other day followed mildly and willingly the orders from the White House, to-day makes the serious charge against the Wilson administration that in sending its estimates to Congress it has estimated in favor of those who receive high salaries as compared to those who labor. I know my colleague is willing to take care of himself. I will let him thrash that out with the President. I suppose when the President crooks his finger my colleague will meekly come. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, here is another very adroit gentleman on the other side who plays politics as much if not more than the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], always "harping on my daughter." The gentleman from Illinois knows quite well that on the tolls-repeal bill I voted for the repeal of the clause exempting coastwise vessels from paying tolls through the Panama Canal. Not that I was ever influenced by anybody on that question, for he ought to know, if he knows anything, that I voted against free tolls in August, 1912, and instead of my being drawn to this measure by the President or the administration, I want to tell him that the President and the administration are following me. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. MOORE. Where is the President and the Democratic administration following the gentleman? To perdition? [Laughter.]

Mr. FOWLER. Now, the gentleman is digressing from his ordinary course, because he is usually courteous, manly, and clean.

Mr. MOORE. I will yield to the gentleman all the time he wants to answer.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman has asked a question that is wholly irrelevant and wholly impertinent to any phase of this discussion, and, of course, I do not desire to follow him in that line; but I do want to say to him, when he asks where this administration is going and what it is doing, that it is rescuing a Government of the people——

Mr. MOORE. Taking something back?

Mr. FOWLER. For the people and by the people from the hands of the few, and placing it into the hands of the many. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE. But the gentleman did not answer the question, Where is the administration following the gentleman; to victory or defeat? We will withdraw "perdition."

Mr. FOWLER. The administration is not following the gentleman from Illinois, or anyone, or any faction, because the Democratic Party has committed itself to general principles; and the President and the majority in Congress are earnestly endeavoring to administer our Government in harmony with these principles.

Mr. MOORE. On the reserve-bank question, and their location, for instance?

Mr. FOWLER. Certainly the gentleman is not complaining of the location of a reserve bank in his city, is he?

Mr. MOORE. Not at all. I am very well satisfied.

Mr. FOWLER. Then I misunderstand the question.

Mr. MOORE. But what about our friends from Louisiana? Are they in perfect harmony with the administration?

Mr. FOWLER. Oh, let me say one word to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. There never was an organization of men that did not have some kickers.

Mr. MOORE. In the gentleman's party? Impossible!

Mr. FOWLER. And the gentleman's party is the best evidence of it, because it kicked until it divided in two pieces. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois by striking out the figures "$4,500" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$6,000."

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, with all due deference to the gentleman, who is a member of the committee, I make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. GOOD. Oh, reserve the point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. I will reserve it for the gentleman.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the gentleman wants to make a point of order against that amendment. The gentleman has said that he wants to be consistent. The gentleman voted for an omnibus public-building bill which carried a provision giving an architect in the Supervising Architect's office $6,000 per annum. We are appropriating money for that position right along, and now the gentleman offers an amendment which places the chief in that office at a salary $1,500 less than the salary he voted for a subordinate. I hope the gentleman will not make the point of order, for I know he wants to be consistent with regard to the salaries, and I hope that he will let the salary of the Supervising Architect be as large at least as the salary he voted to a subordinate.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the gentleman, who is a member of the committee, that I have the greatest deference for him. He is a gentleman of rare qualities and demands the respect of everybody. He is an able gentleman, and ordinarily I would not offer an objection to any amendment that he might propose outside of a political amendment, because I would believe that he would be sincere when he was offering it. But, Mr. Chairman, I want to vote for a bill that will equalize these salaries. I want to classify the public service of this country so that it can be certain and relied upon to inspire employees to work up to a point of efficiency—to climb up the ladder in point of salary—and I do not believe it can be done by piecemeal. For that reason I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MURDOCK. This gives him $4,500?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FOWLER) there were—ayes 5, noes 27.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Comptroller of the Treasury: Comptroller, $6,000; Assistant Comptroller, $4,500; chief clerk, $2,500; chief law clerk, $2,500; law clerks revising accounts and briefing opinions—1, $2,100; 8, at $2,000 each; expert accountants—6, at $2,000 each; private secretary, $1,800; clerks—8 of class 4, 3 of class 3, 1 of class 2; stenographer and typewriter, $1,400; typewriter-copyist, $1,000; 2 messengers; assistant messenger; laborer; in all, $73,460.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, on page 40, lines 21 and 22, the bill carries a provision of $6,000 for the Comptroller of the Treasury. I make the point of order against that part of the bill because the salary as provided by statute is $5,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It is $5,500.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I now offer an amendment, in lines 21 and 22, page 40, to insert the words "Comptroller, $5,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 40, lines 21 and 22, by inserting "Comptroller, $5,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, by permission, I will make that $5,500 instead of $5,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be modified in accordance with the statement of the gentleman from Illinois.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out "$5,500" and insert "$6,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment.

Mr. MANN. Oh, that has been granted, and I move to amend it.

Mr. FOWLER. I withdraw the request.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not withdraw an amendment offered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union without unanimous consent.

Mr. FOWLER. I withdraw the request, because consent to amend it was not granted.

Mr. MANN. It was granted, and I was very careful not to offer my amendment until the Chair put the request, and it was granted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair put the request, stating that without objection the amendment would be modified, and there was no objection offered.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from Illinois withdrawing his amendment?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has presented an amendment, in itself out of order, to which no point of order was made. Any germane amendment to the same subject is in order, so that to amend to increase the amount from $5,500 to $6,000 is in order.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asked the chairman of the committee what the statutory salary of this office is at present.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It is $5,500.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois is sustained. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 8, noes 22.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on page 40, line 22.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, it is too late to make any further points of order on this paragraph. It has already been amended.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I submit the question to the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the statement of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman made a point of order against one item, and it was sustained. Since that time amendments have been offered, and it is now too late to make further points of order against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Undoubtedly that is the precedent.

Mr. FOWLER. I submit to the ruling of the Chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Auditor for War Department: Auditor, $5,000; assistant and chief clerk, $2,250; law clerk, $2,000; Chief of Division of Accounts, $2,500; chief of division, $2,000; 2 assistant chiefs of division, at $1,900 each; chief transportation clerk, $2,000; clerks—22 of class 4, 49 of class 3, 55 of class 2, 45 of class 1, 9 at $1,000 each, 3 at $900 each; skilled laborer, $900; messenger; 5 assistant messengers; 9 laborers (1 transferred to Loans and Currency Division); messenger boy, $480; in all, $292,010.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. May I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill in reference to the salary of the auditor? All of the auditors receive salaries of $4,000 a year now. Two years ago, at my suggestion, the Auditor for the War Department was given $1,000 extra in the sundry civil bill on account of auditing the Panama Canal disbursements. Now, I notice in this bill the gentleman proposes to increase his regular salary from $4,000 to $5,000. May I ask what is the purpose of that?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It is intended to take care of the $1,000 given hitherto in the sundry civil bill. The regular salary is $4,000, and this is extra salary for the Panama Canal auditing.

Mr. MANN. But here comes along the question in reference to the expenses of the canal and all those things. Now, purposely before the extra $1,000 was carried in the canal appropriation so that we might segregate those items that related to the expenses of the canal from other items that had nothing to do with it as far as possible. Does not the gentleman think that is a desirable thing to do? In other words, the auditing of the canal disbursements may be to-day with the Auditor for the War Department; to-morrow the President may direct that the canal work shall be placed under some other Secretary. It is not permanently under the War Department by statute and it is wholly within the will of the President.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. What the gentleman says is quite true, but the Treasury Department requested us to bring the two items together, and we have done so. It is subject to a point of order.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I can see there might be a few cents less expense to pay this out of one item, but I think it is desirable to maintain the matter as it was, and indicate that this extra $1,000 is given for the auditing of the canal disbursements. Personally I would not object to increasing the salary of all the officers from $4,000 to $5,000, but I think, as long as this is for this purpose, it should be kept separate; and therefore I make the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, on page 41, line 13, I move to insert "$4,000" for "$5,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 41, line 13, strike out "$5,000" and insert "$4,000."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. On page 41, line 21, I move to strike out "$292,010" and insert "$291,010."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman to ask unanimous consent that the Clerk correct the total to save time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 21, page 41, strike out "$292,010" and insert "$291,010."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation on a piece-rate basis, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, of such number of employees as may be necessary to tabulate by the use of mechanical devices the accounts and vouchers of the Interior Department; for the purchase or rental of the necessary mechanical devices; and for the purchase of such supplies and the making of such repairs as may be necessary to their maintenance and operation, $14,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, during the fiscal year 1915, in his discretion, diminish the number of positions of the grades below that of clerk at $1,200 per annum in the Office of the Auditor for the Interior Department and use the unexpended balances of the appropriation for the positions so diminished as a fund to pay, on a piece-rate basis to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, the compensation of such additional number of employees as may be necessary to tabulate by the use of mechanical devices the accounts and vouchers of the Interior Department: Provided further, That under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, piece-rate employees in the Office of the Auditor for the Interior Department shall be entitled to the same leave of absence with pay as is provided by law for clerks and employees in the executive departments in Washington. The pay of any piece-rate employee during such leave shall be determined by the average quantity of work done by such employee and the pay therefor.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California will state his point of order.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I make a point of order against the following language of the paragraph and particularly the language in line 11, page 42, "on a piece basis," and after the figures "$14,000," in line 18, at the end of the paragraph. I make the point of order on that language.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the entire paragraph, beginning with line 11, page 42, and extending to line 12, page 43, so there will be no question about it, on the ground that it is new legislation and was not included in a former bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the committee desire to be heard?

Mr. BARTLETT. Will not the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I will reserve my point of order.

Mr. BRYAN. And I will reserve the point of order I made.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the department within the last few years has introduced a number of tabulating machines and other machines to save time, and it is found that the most desirable way to compensate the people who operate those machines is upon the piece-rate basis. I went down to the Post Office Department Building and went all through the office of the Auditor of the Post Office Department. I had him show me all the machines upon which these employees operated. I had him show me the salary roll of the people who were engaged upon those machines. I examined the compensation that they received before they went upon the machines on the piece-rate basis and also the compensation that they were receiving on the piece-rate basis. Out of 175 people engaged in working the machines in the office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department all of them except 11 were making very much more money than they made while they were on the annual roll and some of them were making more than twice as much.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. Did the gentleman consult the rolls to see that a great number of those who were formerly on the rolls making a living had been either sent to the graveyard or eliminated from the service on account of those machines. They are not the same parties.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Now, on page 140 of the hearings, Mr. Kram testified:

There are on the regular roll 376 employees on salary and 162 employees compensated on a piece-rate basis. The piece-rate employees formerly received on an average of $742 per annum when paid on a salary basis. As piece-rate employees they now receive an average of $985 per annum, an increase of 25 per cent in the rate of pay.

Not only that, but the Auditor for the Post Office Department has positively prohibited any person engaged in piece-rate work from working over seven hours a day. The people who are on the statutory roll may remain after 4.30 p. m., or they may go to work a few minutes before 9 if they elect to do so, but no person engaged in piece-rate work is allowed to go to work before 9 or to work after 4.30. I have not heard——

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I have not heard any complaint on the part of the people who are getting the benefit of this salary.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I would like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee if it is not the custom here in Washington in most of the departments to work the clerical force seven hours a day?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. There are a great many chiefs of division who come before our committtee and claim they have to work overtime in order to keep the work current.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. The hours you have just stated are the current hours in practically every department in Washington for the clerical force?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes; but with this difference: People engaged in clerical work are permitted to work overtime and do work overtime in order to keep the work of their office current, but the people who are engaged in doing piecework are not permitted to work overtime.

Now, I have no desire to take up the time of the committee. I want these people to receive fair compensation. I have examined into this thing and I have found that they got an average increase of 25 per cent. I have heard no complaint from the people themselves. This item is subject to a point of order if the gentleman desires to make it.

Mr. KREIDER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes, sir.

Mr. KREIDER. Do you know what the relative cost to the Government is for having the work done, based upon a piece price or per diem pay, as they are now having the work done? What is the relative cost to the Government? Is there a saving one way or the other?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Taking the office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department, where the machines were first introduced, notwithstanding the enormous increase in the postal business, the appropriations from year to year are slightly less. In other words, the very great efficiency in the Office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department takes care of the increase in work without asking for any increase in the appropriation. That is true not only in respect to those who work upon the machines, but with respect to the general force in the office, consisting of 376 people who are not working on machines. It is a very efficiently managed office, in my judgment. But this item is subject to the point of order if the gentleman desires to make it.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the subject has been discussed to some extent, and the office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department has been brought into it, I will state that I have received some complaint from some of the employees who are working under this piece-price system. There is not any question but that the department of the Auditor for the Post Office Department is being operated at considerable less expense than it was in former years. The introduction of the electric tabulating machines took place in July, 1912. A force of 125 women was employed. There is no objection to the operation of those machines. It is the system under which they are operated and the way that the women, who are defenseless in this instance, are treated by the Auditor for the Treasury Department in the operation of this piecework system.

I have a copy of a letter which I have received—and I have the original in my office—that I am going to read for the benefit of the committee. I may have to ask for additional time, but this is an important matter and, in my estimation, we should discuss the matter thoroughly.

This is from a lady who is working for the Auditor for the Post Office Department under this system:

FACTS ABOUT THE OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR FOR THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The middle of July, 1912, the force of about 135 women were put to operate key-punching machines, instructions of 10 days having been previously given.

The salary basis continued until the middle of November, 1912, when the gradual change to piece rate began. Each operator as transferred to piece-rate basis forfeited all leave due her and pay on all legal holidays, namely, Thanksgiving, Sherman's funeral, eve of Christmas and New Years, as well as the days. Those who forfeited the leaves were offered the time without pay, so the services would be spared. The leave was all included in appropriations.

January 2, 1914, those who were not already pieceworkers were put on that roll, the pay for all being $1.50 a thousand.

I might say, Mr. Chairman, in passing, that I hold in my hand the cards that are used on these electric tabulating machines, and are punched, about 20 holes in each card, and they get from $1.20 to $1.50 a thousand.

Mr. BRYAN. For the cards?

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. For the punching of the cards.

Mr. BRYAN. It is only about 15 or 17 cents. I think the gentleman is mistaken there.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. That is by the hundred.

Mr. BRYAN. Fifteen cents a thousand.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. One dollar and twenty cents to $1.50 a thousand. The gentleman is mistaken.

I will read:

January 28, Mr. Kram made a statement to assembled clerks, that owing to an oversight no leave had been provided in the first bill; would go into effect as soon as the second bill passed, which occurred March 3; also, through an anticipated shortage of funds rates were fixed at $1.50, $1.35, $1.20 per thousand, according to grades of work. An allowance of errors one half of 1 per cent; but this more details later.

He stated that he had not calculated on operators making more than $3 a day, showing he had calculated on basis of millions of money orders at so much per thousand, the more earned by clerks, the nearer the work would come to date. The figures would have been too great to try the system.

Leave started from March 5, to exist as in all other executive departments. The pay to be regulated by the average quantity. But the money made in 75 working days was divided by 90 days, making a difference of quite an amount when it came to 15 days' leave; as high as $10 for some. Mr. McAdoo was appealed to but never answered.

Just now the Auditor for Interior Department is adopting piecework, but specifies leave, annual and sick, same as all executive offices. Sick leave was many times refused in other offices.

In other words, they took the quarter and put in 90 days instead of 75 working days and divided up their leave.

Errors are a serious problem. Each card has 20 punches. An allowance of one in 200 cards means one number wrong in 4,000; all over that costs operator 3 cents apiece, or $30 a thousand for spoilage what they are paid $1.50 to do. Three days after work leaves operator, the errors for paid side of money order are found and returned. The issued side for last April and May are just being returned. Operators have no redress; no proof the errors really belong to her as the operator number has been changed four times and cards have passed through many hands that might make errors and no one to find them. For example, a temporary received many errors to pay for. At first thought it useless to try to seek redress; on deeper thought and comparing dates found they were prior to her appointment.

In other words, the operators working in that department—the auditor's department for the Post Office Department—are charged 3 cents apiece for these cards and they are paid $1.50 a thousand; they are charged twenty times what they are paid for in case of an error. All they spoil is the stock and lose such little time as it takes to arrange those cards.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Does the gentleman wish to ask a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I want to give the gentleman some information when he gets through.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. It says:

Last February all limit was taken off; each one told to do all she could. The work was four months behind, so this helped to bring it up; at same time errors from last year were produced in such quantities as to keep pay roll about usual. The scheme worked.

Now, mind you, I got this letter just a few days ago, and the issue side, where the errors are found, for last April and May are just being returned to the operators. Here is what I want to call to your attention. I read further:

A ballot was given each operator to sign and mark "X," which she wanted—piecework at present rate or former salary. No time was allowed for consideration. Few stopped to consider what injustices the present rate carried with it and did not want to return to salary of $720 when making $900, so about 90 per cent marked "piecework." Inside of 48 hours it was used against them. The one not signing at all was dismissed later. A number were notified one time that the record entitled them to do 10 per cent more work if they wrote auditor requesting it. The form of letter was to the effect that they were physically able; at no future time would complain of an injury the strain might cause.

A money order is valid a year, so some are not cashed and returned promptly. When these are missing a blue card is punched, which must be matched to white card made when order is returned. For the past year there are 600,000 unmatched, either through errors or delayed payments.

They have four different numbers. It is pretty hard to determine whose error it is. Nevertheless, in the system in vogue down there the original operator has to suffer the reduction.

I read further:

The examiners of the cards are promoted according to errors found on key punches. Those finding most get first.

Now, here is what I want to call to the attention of the House, to show how this piecework provision has been put in down there.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes longer, as my time is nearly up.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. And the name was inscribed on each card so that they could know who signed the card and how they voted.

I read further:

Sweatshop conditions will be found to exist in many ways if properly investigated. Many are breaking down with nervous prostration, and only a question of time when every one will have paralysis of right arm.

Appropriation now being considered is in bulk as to amount and number of operators, leaving every chance to increase number and reduce rates and curtail leave of absence. Up to present time no one has been granted leave, time taken for urgent demands meant loss of pay, and each entitled to 2½ days a month. He has threatened not to leave them car fare before he finished.

Mr. Taft gave an order to allow those from Bureau of Engraving to take examination and go to $900, as many as 25 a year, as vacancies occurred. For two years nothing was done; vacancies occurring were filled from civil service; finally 30 were given $900 temporarily, but this system abolished all.

In other words, those who are promoted are promoted according to the number of errors they find in the punching of the cards. I read further:

These salaries are $1,000 and $1,200 and $1,400. The money taken from key punchers does not pay them.

In other words, in the Post Office Department they charge them 3 cents apiece for spoiling those cards. The system in vogue in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing is different. There they charge the operators for the cost of the stock that is destroyed. I read further:

The pieceworkers in Bureau of Engraving pay only for material. If that would be the case of key punchers, cards are nominal in price, would not mean hardship.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman refers to Mr. Kram's testimony on page 140 of the hearings. To bear out the statement of my colleague from Washington [Mr. BRYAN], I wish to call attention to another statement that Mr. Kram made. It will be found at about the middle of page 140, where he says:

We have had another difficulty to encounter. When the devices were installed we were obliged to make use of the identical employees who had been engaged for years in assorting money orders by hand. Many of them were well advanced in years, some were of a nervous temperament, and a few were not in good health. When the installation of the electrical tabulation system was recommended, it was recognized that there would be a number of employees in the office who would not be adapted to perform the work, and the department has relieved the office from time to time of persons not adapted to the work, taking over on the rolls of the various bureaus 15 employees in the past 18 months, and on the 12th instant the retransfer of 12 former employees of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing was directed by the Secretary.

I want to call your attention to this fact: The United States Government, through the installation of these electric tabulating machines, has effected an enormous saving in the Post Office Department in tabulating the money orders and vouchers—work that is done by these machines. In addition to that, the man who has charge of this system admits that it is breaking down the health of these women. The employees who have been on the pay roll of the Government for a great many years and a number who were transferred from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing were found to be not qualified to do this work. They have got to have young and strong women to stand the strain. The strain in this instance is something fierce. I think this Government ought to be broad enough and big enough to treat its women employees decently.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I yield.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Do I understand the gentleman to say or to read from a letter that leave with pay is not allowed in the office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department?

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. In the first instance, where no provision was made, they were not allowed leave; but when it was allowed, I will say to the gentleman that instead of computing it from 75 working days in a quarter, this auditor took the 90 days, and this resulted in a loss to the employees of about $10 in each instance, according to the amount of money that they made two weeks prior to the time of getting their leave.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes more.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from California be allowed to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am in sympathy with much that the gentleman has said, but I fail to see how any injustice can be done to the employee merely because the leave is figured on a basis of two or three months rather than on a less time.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I will say to the gentleman that this is piecework. If they made $270 in three months, or $90 a month, and worked 90 days, you would divide $270 by 90, and it would make $3 a day, whereas if you took the 75 working days it would mean more, and their leave would be greater. That is the way they have been depriving some of them of their leave, I will say to the gentleman. I am not holding the committee responsible for any of the conditions that I complain of.

I am satisfied from the reading of the report that it will be found that this gentleman has made a very plausible statement. I am satisfied that when the members of the committee have investigated conditions down there that they will be of my opinion. I not only received the information contained in this letter, and discussed it with the writer, but I asked her to put it in writing, and investigated the matter still further. I am told that the gentleman in charge of that work, in speaking of this situation down there, will give the good side of the situation, but takes care not to allow anyone to consult the young women themselves. The auditor says in his statement to the committee that he must have good, strong, healthy young women, not in so many words, but when he tells of how many people were let out or transferred he means the same thing.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The auditor was before the committee and had a lengthy hearing, which, I suppose, the gentleman has read?

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Yes; I have read it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And as the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] has stated, not only are these people not permitted to work more than seven hours a day, but the supervising official is required to certify that none of them began work before 9 o'clock a. m. and that they did not continue to work after 4.30 p. m. He stated further, as the gentleman knows, that he had adopted a policy whereby he limited the number of cards which the operator was allowed to perforate in a day, and that resulted in a great majority of the employees beginning work at 9 o'clock and quitting at 3 o'clock.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. That is undoubtedly true. But that applies especially to the most competent and the most able, as you will notice. They have 34 employees who earn more than $1,000. It is evident that the most competent are able to reach the limit and leave the office before the 7 or 8 hours have expired, and if you will go down the line you will find that there are 122 employees working for $960 a year or less.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will follow his figures further, he will find that out of 156 employees all but 28 of them are making more money now on the piece-rate basis than they were making under the former practice, and 34 of them are receiving more than $1,000 a year.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I will say to the gentleman this, that there is not any question but that some of them are making more money. It is natural for a human being to do it. But I say this, that so far as this Government is concerned we ought to set a good example instead of the poorest kind of an example. It is human nature for a man or a woman to make all the money he or she possibly can under improved conditions. I think they would be better off if they were to return to the old conditions, and they think so, too. The time will come when even those few who make the most money under the new system will realize that all the advantage that the Government has given to them under this new system will be taken out of their physical condition.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. From these hearings it will appear as a matter of fact that these employees are, under this system, working a less number of hours and making a good deal more money than formerly.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Some of the most proficient are working less. Now, from the information that has been conveyed to me, it is only a year or so since this piecework system was introduced; but up to the time of its introduction the employees that were brought in there were encouraged to go the limit, and when they got to the limit that was used as a basis for determining the piece-price rate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Will you permit me one minute longer?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the statement of the auditor that the average rate they were making was $985. I have figured up the total wages of these 156 employees, and it figures up $137,180. Dividing that by 156, I find that it gives an average of $888 instead of $985. There is a mistake there somewhere.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I should like to ask the gentleman a question before he sits down.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman has only a minute.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I will get recognition in my own time, and will yield time to him.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Has the gentleman been down there and made a personal investigation?

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I have not made a personal investigation.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Does the gentleman think it is fair to a great department of the Government to make the statement he has made on this floor without making a personal investigation?

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I will say this to the chairman, that I am trying to get rid of the system of piecework; and we must consider this: Those women down there are so situated that they are in fear of losing their places. They say that if anybody goes in there and talks to an employee and gets any information, that employee will lose her position. I believe an investigation of the conditions down there ought to be ordered, and I think it is due to the House itself that it order such an investigation.

Mr. MURDOCK. Did not the gentleman state that a vote had been taken among those women early, before they had tried the system a sufficiently long time——

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. And that they voted in favor of it.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Yes; at first.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does not the gentleman think that under the conditions there, under which they are driven, they would like to abandon the system?

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. They would like to have a secret ballot instead of an open ballot such as this man forced on them; they were compelled to sign their names to their ballot.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are not driven. The gentleman is wholly in error in making that statement.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The gentleman from California has read from a letter from a person he never saw and does not know.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. I want to say that I spoke to this lady and I asked her to put her complaint in writing, and then she sent me this letter. The gentleman is mistaken when he says I never saw the party. I know that she works there.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Is she one of the 6 out of the 162—one of the 6 who are making less money than they made before?

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. No, sir; she is not, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman stated a moment ago, as I understood him, in response to a question of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], that they took a vote early in the history of this matter, and that they then decided they were in favor of this change, but that later they had changed their minds.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Here is the language of the letter:

> A ballot was given each operator to sign and mark X whether she wanted piecework at present rate or former salary. No time was allowed for consideration. Few stopped to consider what injustices the present rate carried with it, and did not want to return to salary of $720 when making $900, so about 90 per cent marked "piecework." Inside of 48 hours it was used against them. The one not signing at all was dismissed later.

Mr. MURDOCK. When was that?

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Last February.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I do not know who the writer of that letter is, but it indicates that one's errors may be charged up to somebody else. Any gentleman of this House who goes to the Auditor's Office for the Post Office Department will be convinced to a mathematical certainty that that is impossible, and so much of the letter as states that the errors of one clerk may be charged to another clerk is wrong. It is impossible. Now, Mr. Chairman, here are the figures: From the 1st day of April, 1913, to the 31st day of December, 1913, 162 people were employed upon piecework, and out of those 162, 156 made more money than they made before they went on the piecework basis and 6 people made less. Now, gentlemen, I have been in that office. It is perfectly idle to say that that is a sweatshop. It is not. They are not permitted under any conditions to work over seven hours. They are working in a room that is well ventilated. These electrical machines are not heavy or difficult to manage, and I wish that the members of this committee would go and examine this office for themselves.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. What has the gentleman to say to the statement of the gentleman from California [Mr. J. I. NOLAN] that it is impossible for people beyond the age of youth to operate these machines without breaking down, and that the inauguration of the machines did retire a lot of worthy people there because they were not strong enough to stand the nervous strain of piecework, which the gentleman knows does bring nervous strain?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Let me answer the gentleman from Kansas. I do not know what the age limit is within which people are adapted to work these machines, but I do deny that it is such onerous work as to break down people's health.

Mr. MURDOCK. The communication read by the gentleman from California [Mr. J. I. NOLAN] said that it had broken down the health of some people.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I do not believe it.

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not know whether it was the machine or the piecework system—I suspect that it was the piecework.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I should like to ask the gentleman if he has visited the department, where they are deducted at the rate of 3 cents per card spoiled?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Do you think that is fair?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It is absolutely negligible.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. They get $1.50 a thousand, and the deduction is made at the rate of $30 a thousand.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. After they reach how many?

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. They are only permitted to have a small percentage.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. What is it?

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. An allowance of errors of one-half of 1 per cent. That is the statement.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Now, then, what is the purpose of requiring them to be penalized if they make a certain number of mistakes? It is to encourage them in doing accurate work. The number of mistakes they make in excess of the number they are permitted to make is absolutely negligible.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, the committee is no doubt sincerely in earnest, and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] is as earnest as he can be about this matter. This gentleman, Mr. Kram, at the head of the department is a most plausible gentleman, and no doubt he is sincere, too. He is devoted to his system, and I believe is an efficient man. According to the reputation he has among the employees, he is the most plausible man to be found in Washington. I will illustrate that by saying that he is so plausible that although his position is not under the civil service he has impressed the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury that he, a Republican, is the only man in the United States that is fit to do this particular work, or at least that there is no fit Democrat in all this broad land. Mr. Kram holds his job under this Democratic administration despite ye hungry office seekers. If that does not prove that he is plausible beyond all question and all requirements of 100 per cent plausibility, I will submit the case without another word. [Laughter and applause.]

They claim down there at the Post Office Building that they save money by this proposition. A short time ago they put up in the loft about half a billion money-order checks. They call it the congressional audit, because Mr. Kram was so plausible as to induce the great Appropriations Committee to approve of just forgetting that half year's work. This makes the returns look better and makes the amount of money saved read bigger; but, as a matter of fact, they simply threw that job overboard. Of course, they could run the office for nothing if they kept up that system.

The Government has to pay machine rent and is subjected to a paper subsidy or graft. They can not buy the paper and have it printed here in the Government Printing Office; they have to buy these cards from the monopolists who own the patent and from whom the machines are rented at a high price. It is currently said that the big profit is made out of the sale of the cards. To the credit of the proposition it is claimed that there are fewer clerks, although the business of the Government increases. The clerks are gradually being weeded out and machines put in their places. As far as the labor-saving devices are concerned, I am not here to make any complaint about them, nor will I, but I demand that they be rightly used, and that the human element be considered in connection with their operation. I suppose there is something in the claim that there is a certain amount saved.

On page 44 of the bill it is provided that hereafter any vacancy that occurs from death, resignation, or otherwise in certain departments where piecework is to be instituted there shall be no promotions, and that in all such cases the office will cease to exist and that the money appropriated for that particular division clerk will be turned into the piece-rate business so as to extend its operation, and thereby is perpetuated a gradual but continual elimination of the clerks in favor of piece-rate operators. All hope of promotion in office is gone. They realize that they can not go up, that if anybody resigns above them that office is to be made vacant. Why have promotions down there? Who thinks of promotion in a sweatshop? All that spirit is taken away.

Now, as to the vacation, they have it arranged, except the piecework operators, so that the clerk is responsible for his desk. If he gets off for 30 days, he finds the work piled up before him at the end of the 30 days, and he has to work nights and extra hours to make up the work. That is the kind of process Mr. Kram is following, and it amounts to a cramming process; but he is so plausible, he makes it go, and he is hailed as a wonder. His idea is that the Government is making money, saving a great deal, and he is making a marvelous record, and thereby gets his salary increased from $4,000 to $5,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is an entirely different auditor from the one the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. BRYAN. Oh, no; the gentleman from New York is mistaken; this auditor that I speak of, I know gets $5,000.

Mr. KREIDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes; although my time has nearly expired.

Mr. KREIDER. Did I understand the gentleman to say that when one of these girls gets leave of absence for 30 days that the work that she would ordinarily do during that time is piled up on her desk, and that she is required to do it when she comes back in addition to her usual and ordinary work?

Mr. BRYAN. Not only that, but they have to certify when they want to get away that they are going to look out for the work that piles up while they are gone. It is only the emergencies that have to be done that are done while they are away, and when they come back they have to work day and night. Then this Mr. Kram comes and jams into the minds of the committee, by his peculiarly plausible processes of jamming and cramming, the idea that he is making money for the Government, and they forget to consider how he makes it. Some clerk said recently—and I relate this just to show how popular his work is—that if that man was to fall down an elevator shaft the clerks would wear red chrysanthemums instead of crêpe. It was a very modest person that said it, too.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. If the gentleman had all this information, why did he not come before the Committee on Appropriations with it?

Mr. BRYAN. I think the gentleman from South Carolina is not quite fair in asking that question. In the first place, I did not have the information, and, then, I had other committees to attend and other matters to consider. I am willing to admit, though, if the committee thinks so, that for my dereliction I ought to be censured; but how about the committee and others who should know about these things? I——

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman argues that the people are afraid of the auditor. They need not be afraid of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BRYAN. I will accord the same admission for the other gentlemen who know about this thing, and will admit that they ought to be censured, too. People may think that this is an Aladdin lamp sort of story, an hallucination or something else, but the Civic Welfare League of this city has taken the matter up, and I was just told at the phone a moment ago that Mrs. McLaughlin has gone down there now to confer about a girl who has fallen by the way with St. Vitus's dance. I tell you the machinery arrangement and the error-slip method they throw back on these girls and men in the department makes it a regular hell on earth, and it is all resolved in favor of saving a penny or two for Uncle Sam. Every principle that has heretofore been held dear to employees in the Government, in the interest of emulation, of advancement, of merit, and reward is abandoned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYAN. Gentlemen talk about the increased income of the piece-rate operators. The gentleman from South Carolina says that the average is $985 a year, and says that is a tremendous increase over the average that they have gotten before, and he commends the situation—honestly and sincerely, I believe, and I am not censuring the committee—because these clerks get $985 a year, while over here in the Library, where the employees do nothing very laborious or trying, but because they were getting below $900 a year the committee suffered all kinds of pangs and raised the salaries; and the fact that these people here are getting $985 as an average is presented as an unusual argument in favor of the system. The record shows that 30 of those employees get $960, that 24 of them are earning $900, that 20 of them are earning $840, 20, $780, and that 10 of them are getting as low as $660, out of a group used to calculate the average of $985 per year. There are a few of them high up in these averages, but there is nothing here to show that the high-salaried clerks put into this piece-rate business are not at the top in the averages and the low ones still at the bottom, so that while it may show that some of them get more, there is nothing to show that the employees that were low before are getting more now. The truth is that they are able to work inefficient people in that department in this piece-rate system on these machines. A short time ago, I am told—and I can not verify this absolutely—there was taken out of there to the insane asylum one person, who died quite recently out here in St. Elizabeth's. I want to impress upon this committee that I am as sincere about this thing as I can be about anything, and this ought to go out of this bill, and there ought to be some kind of a revision down there based on humanity, decency, and Americanism, rather than having for its base solely the saving of a penny for Uncle Sam.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has again expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a year ago I called the attention of Congress to the situation in the office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department, and to the complaints that were being made in reference to the piecework. Personally I never have been, and am not now, one who favors any permanent system by the Government for work by piece. I do not believe in any theory of work which requires people to exert themselves to the utmost. I think that everyone ought to have some reserve power left. A year ago I undertook to investigate the matter a little, more after I had spoken in the House on the subject than I had before. I have no doubt that my distinguished friends from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] and from California [Mr. J. I. NOLAN] will do the same. After my further investigation I was inclined to think that the complaints which had been made to me by ladies working in that office were not as well founded as they themselves believed them to be. It is quite natural, where you change from one form of work to another, that some one doing that work will have some complaint to make.

A moment ago the gentleman from Washington said with great horror in his voice that one of these ladies developed St. Vitus's dance—chorea, I believe is the technical term. The gentleman from Washington seems to have the idea that St. Vitus's dance is something terrible, and I suppose figured that it would be an awful thing. Mr. Chairman, I have had St. Vitus's dance all of my life, and I know perfectly well that I could not operate one of those machines. When I was a young fellow, along with other young fellows, I tried to operate a telegraph instrument, a ticker. All the boys used to have telegraph tickers, with wires. I learned when I was not very old that I could not control the motions of my hand in operating a machine of that kind, and lots of girls and lots of men would find that they can not operate a machine that requires constant work with the fingers like one of these machines, or like a typewriting machine. But that is nothing against the method, and nothing against the person. Those so afflicted will have to find some other way of earning a living.

It seems to me, after all, in this matter the question is whether we will install labor-saving machinery. Of course that is a very old problem, and the gentleman from Kansas, I presume, would be in favor of typesetting machinery, possibly; I do not know whether he employs it in his office. There was a great fight over the question of whether we would have typesetting machinery installed in the Government Printing Office. There is a great fight always when it is proposed to install new machinery which apparently will do away with somebody's employment, but usually results in a greater employment.

Mr. MURDOCK. If the gentleman will permit, it may be of interest to the gentleman from Illinois to know that when we did install typesetting machines, and they are now in general use, they ceased piecework, which goes to the very foundation of this proposition.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I want to say further to the gentleman there is no complaint of mine against the installing of these labor-saving devices; it is the piecework system.

Mr. MANN. I have no criticism of the gentleman's complaint. The gentleman complained that in the change injustice is done to somebody. Well, that is nearly always the case, but it takes time to regulate those things. I suppose these machines ought to be installed. I believe we ought to pay the people, shortly at least, not on a piece basis but on a per diem or monthly basis.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I will state to the gentleman that is my idea. I do not kick about these machines in other respects.

Mr. MANN. I do not think you can get them installed until you try it on the piece basis, and beyond that I would not insist upon the piece basis.

Mr. BRYAN. If the gentleman will yield at that point, does not the gentleman think and believe it is very wrong for the Government to have that many clerks down there doing the work and not to permit them to present their arguments officially?

Mr. MANN. Some of them have seen my friend from Washington and a number of them have seen me, and it is apparent undoubtedly some have seen the gentleman from California. I do not see any difficulty with the clerks in Washington presenting their grievances or to get a hearing. I am inclined to think that the clerks with grievances in seeing Members of Congress, as a rule, get a much better hearing than the heads of departments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there have been many statements made here which I believe are grossly exaggerated. For instance, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] stated that the Auditor for the Post Office Department was such a plausible man that he succeeded in having his compensation increased to $5,000 while other auditors receive but $4,000. The compensation of the Auditor for the Post Office Department was increased while Mr. Chance, present chief clerk of the Post Office Department, was the auditor, and it was intended to give him the benefit of the increased compensation because of his very great efficiency. Mr. Kram was not auditor and was not considered or thought of at the time the increase was made.

Mr. BRYAN. If the gentleman will permit, does not the present law give Mr. Kram $4,000 and the bill of the gentleman give him $5,000? Have not you raised it $1,000——

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; the compensation was increased commencing with the beginning of the fiscal year 1912.

Mr. BRYAN. If he gets paid according to law he gets $4,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That has been the compensation for three fiscal years, and the law was passed on March 4, 1911, when Mr. Chance was Auditor for the Post Office Department. The purpose was to give the increase to Mr. Chance. Mr. Chance afterwards went to the President's Economy Commission at a compensation of $6,000 a year, and Mr. Kram was not the auditor. When it was proposed in 1912 to install the piece-rate system, there was very grave doubt in the minds of the Committee on Appropriations whether it should be done. I am somewhat familiar myself with the abuses which grow out of putting employees upon the piece-rate basis, and I know that the result frequently has been that the so-called pace-makers, the most efficient employees, are taken as a standard by which the compensation is fixed. I personally was somewhat adverse to the system being installed. It was installed, however, upon assurances being given that not only would it increase the efficiency of the service, but that it would not result in decreasing the compensation of the persons employed, but would increase their compensation. It has been in effect now since 1912.

When it was first proposed the matter was discussed in the House. My recollection is that statements were made that the committee were solicitous that there should be no injustice nor any decrease. No one employed in that division has ever spoken to me but one woman. I recollect during last summer an employee of the Auditor for the Post Office Department called at my office and said that she was about to be transferred to one of these machines. She was of a nervous disposition and said she could not successfully operate one of them, that there were some vacancies in some other bureaus of the Treasury Department to which some of these women were being transferred and she requested me to ask the head of the department to grant her the transfer. I had never seen her before and have never seen her since and I do not know her name, but I spoke to the head of the department and explained the situation to him and she was transferred to prevent her going out of the service. It is unfair for gentlemen to make these charges. I have in my hand the urgent deficiency bill which passed this Congress and was signed yesterday, and in it was a provision to this effect:

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized during the remainder of the fiscal year 1914 to diminish, as vacancies occur, the number of positions of the several grades below the grade of chief of divisions in the office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department and use the unexpended balances of the appropriations for the positions so diminished as a fund to pay, on a piece-rate basis, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, the compensation of such number of employees as may be necessary to tabulate, by the use of mechanical devices, the accounts and vouchers of the Postal Service.

These energetic gentlemen never raised their voices in protest when that item was before the House a short time ago.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In just a moment. They never suggested this gross injustice of which they now complain. They never mentioned either on the floor or to any member of the committee the fact that employees in the office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department felt that an injustice was being done to them or that they were being treated unfairly or improperly. Nothing was said during the general debate upon this bill; but when this item is reached these gentlemen produce this alarming information, one about a person being taken out with St. Vitus's dance, and another person being taken to the insane asylum, at St. Elizabeth's, and I do not know what other things the very active imagination of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] might picture in a moment if he had not been so rushed.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I will state to the gentleman that I would have made objection at the time the urgent deficiency bill was under consideration, but it was two or three days after you had passed that page when this was called to my attention.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That was some time ago, long before that bill was completed, long before it was reported, and the gentleman from California, so far as I am aware, never suggested to any member of the Committee on Appropriations, either on this side of the House or on his own side of the House, that there was complaint, or that there was unjust or unfair treatment. This committee has not shown any disposition to treat the female employees of the Government unfairly. At the last session of Congress the committee recommended and carried through the House an appropriation of $63,000 to increase the compensation of the assistants to the plate printers in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, a class of female employees without any political influence, without any political friends; but upon information brought to the committee, and investigation which made the Members believe that their compensation should be increased, the recommendation was cheerfully made, and it met with the approbation of the House.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt a moment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I want to assure the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and the subcommittee that it is not my intention in endeavoring to strike out this paragraph to reflect on the subcommittee or the general Committee on Appropriations. And if I had known of these matters, if I had had more experience in the House, I would not have hesitated to go before the committee and registered my objections there. But I am only getting acquainted with the procedure of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my time may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, it was not necessary. It was not chiefly for the purpose of saving money that this system was installed, but it was for the purpose of increasing the efficiency of the auditing of that which constantly comes into the office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department. As to auditing the money orders, the auditor says:

Our experience has been that in 1909, in auditing the money orders by making a visual comparison of the amounts with the postmasters' statements, 1,620 errors were disclosed in each 1,000,000 money orders checked. With the use of the adding machine and tape, in 1910 and 1911, 4,076 errors were disclosed in each 1,000,000 money orders handled. Since the installation of the present system of electrical tabulation on July 1, 1912, 6,236 discrepancies have been disclosed in each 1,000,000 money orders audited. It is not believed that the postmasters, as a class, are less efficient now than they were several years ago; the increased efficiency of the audit is to be credited to the new system and the higher degree of efficiency required of the employees who operate the devices.

The Auditor for the Post Office Department said there was no change in the efficiency of the postmasters, but this mechanical method of checking up these accounts was such as to very greatly improve the efficiency of the department. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] referred to what he called a congressional audit of certain money orders down there. The Auditor's Department was so far behind that during the last fiscal year the matter was called to the attention of both Committees on Appropriations, that in the House and the committee in the Senate. The situation was fully explained, and there was required either a temporary force to bring up certain arrears, or provision was necessary that certain of these returns should not be audited. The Secretary of the Treasury recommended that they be not audited, but that the returns be filed without audit, and upon investigation it was found to be the best thing to be done. I shall insert in the RECORD, so that it may be available, a letter dated February 27, 1913, addressed to Senator WARREN, who was then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, by Secretary MacVeagh, in which the entire matter was explained and the provision inserted:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 27, 1913.

Hon. F. E. WARREN,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate.

SIR: I beg to invite your attention to a situation which has developed in connection with the recent introduction of a new method of auditing money-order accounts in the office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department, which accomplishes large economies and a quicker audit and which was authorized by Congress. Under the former process of auditing money orders it was not possible to be current with the work, the arrearage being from one to two years; two years ago this arrearage amounted to one year. The new mechanical system of auditing as devised and authorized was installed August 23, 1912. At the time of the installation of this new system there was still to be completed about 25 per cent of the work of auditing money orders which had been received during the nine months prior to July 1, 1912. The money orders for this period can not be audited under the new system, but will have to be completed under the old method. The new system of auditing involves mechanical tabulation, and is working satisfactorily; and its superiority over the former method of auditing is being demonstrated daily. The audit of the paid side of money-order accounts received since July 1, 1912, is current, and the audit of the issued side is progressing satisfactorily, and it is believed the entire audit of money-order accounts will be completed under the new system within six months from the date of the transactions—a result never before possible. However, a certain amount of delay was incurred in the introduction of the new methods, a delay caused not only through the uncertain time when legislative authority would be given, but also after authority was given, through the inexperience of all the operatives and the inaptitude of many.

At the time of the installation of the new system the audit of the accounts under the old method for the three preceding quarters was in progress. It has developed, however, that by reason of the assignment of the fit and apt employees to the new system the efficiency of the remainder of the force has been so depleted that we are unable to make any material progress toward the finishing of the audit of the money orders received prior to July 1, 1912.

The important items of the audit of this back work have been accomplished; that is to say, all of the eight credit items have been audited and only two of the nine debit items—domestic money orders issued and fees received therefor—remain to be verified. In order to make the verification of these two debit items, it is estimated that about 59,000,000 money orders must be assorted into offices and arranged in numerical sequence.

I feel it my duty to notify Congress that either a temporary force should be provided to bring up the arrearage or that authority should be given to abandon the incompleted portion of the audit. Personally I think the former plan is the better; and I desire to invite the attention of the Congress to the fact that upon the recommendation of the auditor, made in good faith, and which I approved, a reduction of 78 employees was made in the force of that office for the current year. The total and continued saving amounts to $100,000 each year. I now feel that this reduction should not have been made until the old work was finished and the new system completely installed, and therefore I recommend that the Congress grant authority for the employment of 90 money-order assorters, at $720; 2 messengers, at $720; and 3 laborers, at $660, for the period of one year, which will involve a total appropriation of $67,000. With this force I am confident the uncompleted work can be finished. A precedent exists for such an appropriation, for in 1893 a joint commission of Congress, known as the Dockery Commission, investigated the methods of accounting and recommended a change in the settlement of money-order accounts. The audit was then two years in arrears, and for the purpose of bringing up that arrearage the sum of $50,100 was appropriated for the fiscal year 1905, and was continued for several subsequent years.

In the event Congress should decide not to make this appropriation I think it well to give serious consideration to the alternative plan, and in this connection I would invite attention to the facts referred to above to the effect that a large portion of the audit (including all the debit side) has been completed and only a minor portion of the audit of the issue side for one quarter and the major portions of the issue side for two quarters remain unaudited.

Under the act of May 27, 1908, the auditor is required to maintain a permanent record of all unpaid money orders. Should Congress direct the discontinuance of the work for the period involved authority should be given to retain all the statements and accompanying money orders relating to these accounts. Should this plan be decided on the following language it is believed would, if enacted, cover the matter:

"That hereafter the Auditor for the Post Office Department shall not assort and verify the money orders pertaining to postmasters' issued lists covering the period from January 1, 1912, to June 30, 1912.

"Provided, That the statements for said period and accompanying money orders shall be retained as a part of the record of unpaid money orders required by the act approved May 27, 1908."

Very truly, yours,

FRANKLIN MACVEAGH, Secretary.

Mr. MURDOCK. Was this passing of the audit before the installation of the machines or afterwards?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was after the installation of the machines, and there was an arrearage of about six months.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman know whether it was before they inaugurated piecework? Was it before the audit? How did it come that this enormous accumulation of unaudited money-order advices accumulated there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. These accounts had been in arrearage for two years and had never been current. They brought them up to one year, and then got them up to about six months.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then the absence or presence of the machines had nothing to do with the accumulation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Nothing whatever to do with it, except for the taking of some employees from that work, but simply to dispose of these arrearages and file certain statements, so that they would be available if necessary, and then start off current on this new work.

Mr. BRYAN. And clearing the decks and letting the machines start without any back work helps them to catch up?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That had nothing to do with it, because there was no practical advantage to be had from the auditing in the way it had been done.

Mr. BRYAN. Is it not a fact that they are three or four months behind now, so that they are nearly back to where they started when they threw away that six months' work?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no information that they are behind at all.

Mr. BRYAN. I understand they are, but I am not sure about it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But everyone, Mr. Chairman, who has looked into the matter, I think, practically has become convinced that not only is the auditing greatly improved and much more efficient, but there is, in addition, that which is of some importance, a considerable saving in the cost of doing the work. I am not in favor of reducing proper compensation to Government employees. At the same time no one can justify the making of appropriations merely to keep employees at work by the Government. If their services are not necessary, and unless they can be absorbed in some other branch of the Government service, there can be no justification for continuing a system merely in order that some one may have a job.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is right.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. What does the gentleman consider the greatest saving has been effected by—by the installation of the machinery itself or by the installation of the piecework system after the introduction of the machines?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, the piecework was adopted because it was impossible under the other system properly or adequately to determine the compensation that should be allowed. In addition, the activity and efficiency of the employee would determine very much the value of his service.

The 3 cents a card penalty that is put on the employees was not done in order to make a profit, but it was done in order to prevent gross and indefensible carelessness. A margin of error was allowed which experience demonstrated would be fair. Then if employees so performed their duties as to have very largely increased errors that should not exist, the penalty was affixed; and if the errors grow to such an extent as to make the work practically useless, they are dismissed from the service. But the mere fact that the stock costs $1.50 a thousand and the penalty is 3 cents a card is hardly justification for the complaint that is made.

Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] has said, he personally went through that office, and saw the operation of the machines, and examined the pay rolls and compared them, and spent a sufficient time there to enable him to make a report upon which the committee was justified in acting, in addition to the other information which it had. I believe the action of the committee on this bill is wholly justified. There may be persons who are dissatisfied, but, on the whole, I believe that very few of the employees are dissatisfied and that a great majority of them are now better off in every respect than they were prior to the installation of the machines.

Then, another thing can be said in perfect candor: There were a number of very old persons employed in the office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department. They might be classified or characterized as superannuated employees. They were not of very much value under any system. Under this system I have no doubt that many of them have been eliminated from this work. Some of them have been transferred to other bureaus of the Treasury Department and some of them, I have no doubt, have been eliminated from the service.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. Is it not very likely that the elimination of those old and superannuated people accounts to a great extent for this magnificent raise of compensation to the amount of nine hundred and some odd dollars a year salary?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, I think not. Under the law all the heads of these departments are required not to continue in the service persons who are not up to the average standard of efficiency.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I want to ask him another question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Can the gentleman tell us if there is any hope that we shall drop this piecework method in the Department, and that this is only passing and transient?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If there were a real substantial foundation for the claim that under this method of payment any injustice is done to the employees, either in the manner of compensation or with regard to the spur that is put on their work, I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that the committee would be unanimous in favor of some different method of compensation. But all the information that the committee possessed was to the effect that there was no complaint and no grievance that would justify the discontinuance of these machines.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. The protest is not against the machine, but against the piecework.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I want a vote on the amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. How about the point of order, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The point of order is well taken. I do not want to waste time on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. What particular part of the paragraph was the point of order against?

Mr. BRYAN. It was against the paragraph from line 10, on page 42, to line 11, on page 43.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Does the gentleman from Washington want to cut the amount out of the appropriation entirely?

Mr. BRYAN. No; we hope that the Senators will see that justice is done with regard to this matter.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The gentleman does not know what he is doing. All that is desired is to cut out the piece rate.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina offer an amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes; I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. I did not withdraw my point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The paragraph has gone out of the bill. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Auditor for Post Office Department: Auditor, $5,000; assistant and chief clerk, $3,000; law clerk, $3,000; expert accountant, $3,000; 4 chiefs of division, at $2,250 each; 4 assistant chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; 3 principal bookkeepers, at $2,000 each; clerks—25 of class 4, 48 of class 3, 58 of class 2, 85 of class 1, 47 at $1,000 each, 12 at $900 each; skilled laborers—5 at $840 each, 11 at $720 each, 6 at $660 each; messenger boys—4 at $480 each, 5 at $420 each, 5 at $360 each; 10 male laborers, at $660 each; forewoman, $480; 19 charwomen; in all, $433,340.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I find that this bill raises the salary of the Auditor for the Post Office Department from the statutory salary of $4,000 to $5,000, and I make a point of order on the figures "$5,000."

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the entire paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] made the point of order against the figures "$5,000," and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] reserves the point of order against the paragraph. Will the chairman of the committee advise the Chair what the statutory salary is?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The salary fixed by law is $4,000. It has been appropriated for years at $5,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. FOWLER. I make a point of order against the assistant chief clerk, $3,000, in line 21, page 43. The salary carried by the bill is $3,000. The statutory salary is $2,500.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The point of order is well taken, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the whole paragraph go out?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] only made the point of order against that portion relating to the salary of the assistant and chief clerk, $3,000.

Mr. BARTLETT. He reserved a point of order against the whole paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. He reserved it against the paragraph, but only made it against the portion indicated.

Mr. BRYAN. I move to amend by inserting in the blank where the "$5,000" was stricken out the figures "$4,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 43, line 21, after the word "auditor," insert the figures "$4,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BRYAN. Let us have a division, Mr. Chairman. I want to see who the gentlemen are who do not want to give him anything. There is a little glory in trying to save him $4,000. I am willing to give him something.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 9, noes 25.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, in line 21, page 43, I offer an amendment to insert the figures "$2,500" where the figures "$3,000" were stricken out by the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 43, line 21, after the word "clerk" insert the figures "$2,500."

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move to amend by substituting $3,000.

Mr. FOWLER. I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no law fixing it at $2,500.

Mr. FOWLER. There is a law fixing it at $2,500.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Where is it? The gentleman must produce his law.

Mr. FOWLER. Oh, no.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Illinois moves to amend by inserting the figures "$2,500." A gentleman proposing an amendment must produce the law to substantiate it. I am informed on very reliable authority that there is no law fixing the salary at $2,500.

The CHAIRMAN. When an item is stricken out on a point of order and an amendment is offered, it devolves upon the gentleman proposing the amendment to show the law authorizing it.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, the statute authorizes a salary of $2,500.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman point out that statute?

Mr. FOWLER. I will get it.

Mr. BRYAN. I submit, Mr. Chairman, if anyone challenges the gentleman's statement, can we not save time by voting down the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Washington that the universal rule heretofore adopted by Chairmen of the Committee of the Whole is that when a point of order is made against a provision in the bill upon the ground that it is not authorized by law, it is the duty of the committee to show that it is authorized or it goes out. After that if a gentleman offers an amendment placing the salary at a figure that he claims is statutory law, the duty then devolves on him to show that it is the law.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, it was conceded by the committee that my point of order was correct. I stated that the salary fixed by law was $2,500. It was conceded by the committee that that was correct.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it was conceded that there was no authority for $3,000; that was all.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, the statute fixing these salaries says for the sixth auditor, and the sixth auditor is the Auditor for the Post Office Department, salary $2,500.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I have a compilation which is a well-recognized standard authority, prepared in 1893 by the clerks to the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. Cleaves and Mr. Courts. From that it appears that in 1853 the salary of the chief clerk to the Auditor for the Post Office Department was fixed at $2,000. In 1875 that office was abolished, and the duties thereof devolved upon the deputy auditor created by the act of 1875.

From 1882 to 1894 the appropriation bills carried the position of chief clerk to the auditor at the rate of $2,000 a year. In 1912 two deputy auditors were dropped, and a provision carried for assistant and chief clerk at $3,000 a year. That was when the position, assistant and chief clerk, first appeared. The gentleman having moved an amendment to fix the compensation at $2,500 for the assistant and chief clerk, and there being no authority for such office except as found in the appropriation bill, an amendment fixing the compensation at any sum is in order, the point of order not having been reserved to the first amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois want to be heard further?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, while I have not the statute here, I say to the Chair that there is a statute fixing the salary of the chief clerk at $2,500. I know that is true. I ran it down no longer ago than 48 hours, as I ran down all of these salaries, so that I might bring them down to date. The salary of the sixth auditor's office, which is the Post Office Department, is fixed at $2,500.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is an assistant and chief clerk.

Mr. FOWLER. Oh, it has been repeatedly held that you can not destroy a statutory office by hanging to it another term which is not provided for by the statute, and that is just this effort of the distinguished gentleman from New York, the chairman of the committee, is making his statement upon. It is based upon the theory that this is a position of assistant and chief clerk, whereas the statute provides for a chief clerk. It has been repeatedly held that you can not destroy a statutory provision by uniting to the term created by the statute another term not created by the statute. I presume none of these gentlemen will deny but that the chief clerk of the auditor's office in the Post Office Department has a salary of $2,500.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do deny it, and we have not been able to find such a statute.

Mr. FOWLER. I will telephone to my office for it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We can not wait until the gentleman telephones all around town.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair is, by nature of things, not familiar with all of these statutes fixing the salaries of departmental officials, and when they come up and the point of order is made that it is not authorized by law and there is a controversy about what the law is, he must look to the person whose duty it is to furnish the law, and if he fails to do it the Chair must overrule the point of order. Therefore this point of order is overruled, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FOWLER) there were 27 ayes and 2 noes.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently there is no quorum present nor within hailing distance. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15279, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; and, finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the Clerk to call the roll, and he returned herewith the list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation on a piece-rate basis, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, of such number of employees as may be necessary to tabulate by the use of mechanical devices the accounts and vouchers of the Postal Service, $191,130: Provided, That not exceeding $24,840 may be used for the payment of compensation to piece-rate employees absent on leave.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that. I would like to ask, before I lose any rights I may have, if those figures—$191,130—represent an increase? From the information afforded here, it appears that is a raise from $166,960 to $191,130. As to those figures, I make the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, this is an increase of $24,170.

Mr. BRYAN. I make the point of order on those figures.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the point of order does not lie, according to rule 2.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 44, after the word "compensation," in line 7, strike out the words "on a piece-rate basis"; also the comma after the word "basis"; also strike out all of lines 11, 12, and 13.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, this is in line with the argument we had a while ago on page 42, when that portion relative to the piecework in the Interior Department was under discussion. The amendment that I offer strikes out all of that paragraph that has reference to piecework. It leaves the appropriation intact. It leaves the Auditor of the Post Office Department in a position to put those operating the electrical tabulating machines in the department on a per diem or monthly basis, to put them back where they were before the installation of the piecework system. In offering this amendment I have no desire to drive out of that department those machines that are used there for tabulating postal orders and vouchers; but I do say to the Members of this House that I think it stands the United States in bad stead, after installing electrical tabulating machines that save the Government thousands of dollars, to follow it up with the establishment of a piecework system, the basis for which is the highest point of efficiency to which those operators can be driven. The statement has been made here this afternoon that the operatives are well satisfied with the conditions under which they work. I read a letter here from a lady who is working in that department, and I have consulted with her and others in the department. They tell me the conditions down there are not such that women can stand it for any considerable period of time. They are breaking down under it and are liable to suffer nervous prostration, and they make the statement that the right arm in the course of time might suffer a stroke of paralysis. It is all right to say that the young, energetic, and able-bodied women can do this work. They can. I say that this Government is big enough and we are well enough off financially to pay the women who are operating these devices in the auditor's department of the Postal Service their salary on the same basis that we are paying our employees in the Pension Bureau and also in the Census Department.

If piecework is to prevail in the Postal Department in the tabulating of the money orders it ought to be followed up in every other branch of the Government service, and if it is right in the Postal Service it ought to be right in every other department. I think we ought to drive out of the Postal Service any opportunity for criticism of the Government. I believe those employees ought to be treated as we treat every other employee. They have no organization to present their grievances. We have our mechanics in the navy yard, and we have machines there, but we do not install a system of piecework there. Those men are in a position to protest, not alone in Washington, but they have their organizations scattered broadcast throughout the country to protest for them in the various congressional districts. These women in Washington are looking to Congress for redress, and the amendment I offer is for the purpose of taking out of that particular department the piecework and restoring them to the basis they enjoyed prior to its installation, putting them on the same basis as clerical help in the various other departments of the Government.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I will.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman's amendment should prevail, might not the Secretary of the Treasury still fix the compensation on the piecework basis?

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I believe if this House strikes out of the bill the recommendation, and if our action be confirmed at the other end of the Capitol, that the Secretary of the Treasury would not care to assume the responsibility for the installation of the piecework system. I do not want to strike out the entire paragraph. I do not want to interfere with the system down there of tabulating. I do not want to interfere with the machines. But I do believe that we ought at least to relieve these women down there, and some of them are getting along fairly well in years, and if this system keeps up they will have to go out of the service upon the same theory that some peope—a great number of them, as testified to by the auditor—were put out of that particular service when this system first went into effect and they installed these machines. My amendment simply provides for the driving out of the piecework system.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry to disagree with my friend from California [Mr. J. I. NOLAN], because I believe our motives in this matter are practically identical; but I believe that in public employment the very worst mistake Congress could make would be to discourage the use of labor-unit standards where the principle of standardization can be fairly applied. First, let me say we are not dealing with a profit-making institution. We are not dealing with an agency that is under any temptation to overwork the employee for the sake of the profit it can make out of him. We are dealing with the Government—that is, the public in its organized capacity—a merely ethical employer that has as much interest in the employee's welfare as it has in any other portion of society, and any temptation to abuse that might flow from the piecework system with the private employer is absent in the case of the Government.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. With pleasure.

Mr. MURDOCK. Who owns these machines?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I do not know.

Mr. MURDOCK. Well, now, if they should be owned by a private company, would it not be in the interest of that private company to operate these machines up to their limit through the operation of piecework, and in that situation would not the gentleman's argument fall flat?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. No; the private company does not determine the number of hours of work; it is not more than eight——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Seven.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Seven hours. Now, I want to say here, as one who knows nothing but work, that the man or woman who is not willing to work energetically seven hours for the Government does not want to work at all. [Applause.] I have made something of an investigation of this piece-work system as it is employed by the Auditor for the Post Office Department; and as one very greatly interested in the extension of the public functions to proper subjects of governmental action—I have in mind now particularly the telephone and telegraph, and recently acquired postal-express service—that when we secure a standard to determine in advance what the workman for the Government should do, all objection has been overcome to the public administration of the public monopolies. The conviction is very widespread that men will not work for the Government as well as when supervised by the special interest of a private employer. I am afraid that is sometimes true, but there is a broad principle of exception to it; namely that line of public employment where the amount of work can be determined upon and assigned in advance, like the carrier on the rural route, and in the city carrier, where the daily task is defined, and the delinquent workman is subject to an automatic check. Now, this method under a public-service operating motive is an ideal method. First, you have seven hours—I understand in this instance—as the maximum hours of work. Now, if these employees are like the rest of us, some of them are lazy possibly and some of them are energetic. Under this system those who are disinclined to work are placed under proper inducement; made to do their share of the work. Those who are quicker are held in check, because they are not allowed to do more than a given amount of work. I should say without further description that the system as I have seen it down here is not only not subject to indictment and attack, but is absolutely ideal, in my judgment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Maryland may be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, how long does the gentleman from South Carolina intend to keep us here?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Just until we dispose of this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand the gentleman to say that he has personally investigated the work of the Auditor for the Post Office Department. It has been stated here to-day that there is considerable complaint and dissatisfaction and that the conditions there are such that they should not be tolerated. Will the gentleman state what the result of his personal investigation is as to the conditions under which these persons are employed on these machines?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I may not be able to say that my examination was sufficiently detailed as to cover personal pathology, if I may use the expression, in answer to the gentleman, but it did include the actual inspection of the work they were doing.

It is not different in character from the work that a girl performs on a typewriter, not as complex, I should say, because the factors are reduced to the very fewest in number. And the system is worked out in this way: For example, those who can put through a thousand cards with a percentage of error that is not greater than a given figure will be allowed to work up to 1,200 cards, provided their percentage of error does not increase too fast. The maximum work allowed within lines is determined by the minimum of errors, and you have mutually operating checks, which, with a seven-hour day and the purely ethical motive of the Government, emphatically insure fair conditions. One can not speak, of course, for every employee in the department, and I do not presume to speak for them; but I do speak for that great public interest that is entitled to have the public functions properly discharged, and that has been deterred from having services rendered by the postal system in this country, and rendered by the leading postal systems of the earth, because in the absence of a fair count interested parties have been able to say that the Government employee was inefficient, as false a slander on the postal system as the lies of Lucifer. When an opportunity comes to apply a standard of fair dealing between the Government and its employees, which kills off these slanderers of its employees, I say that those who stand on the ground I do, namely, that the hope of labor is in the proper extension of public ownership, have something to explain when they attack a system like this.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. With pleasure.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maryland if he has in his investigations looked into the condition of the employees and found out how much satisfaction or dissatisfaction existed with the piecework system?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I did not need to do that, I will say to the gentleman from California. I worked on a piecework system in the mines myself, the hardest kind of toil that an individual can render, and I am very slow to condemn the system under Government application and a seven-hour day, which is good on its face, because there are complaints about it. Where is the system that will not bring complaints?

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I would like to ask the gentleman if in his investigations there he found out if the employees down there were docked at the rate of 3 cents apiece for these cards that were spoiled, after being allowed one-half of 1 per cent in errors as against $1.50 a thousand, their highest pay for work on the tabulating machines?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I know there is a system of checking up errors. If errors were not checked up in the division, there would be no motive to do the work accurately, and the work must be done accurately. And I would say from the inspection I gave the matter that it not only should not be attacked in this House, but that the officers who have introduced it and who are maintaining it are entitled to the commendation of the Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, of course we all know that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] is authority on a great many labor propositions and is very earnest in his advocacy of reforms along that line. Now, he compares the work done on these machines with the work done on the typewriter. The fact is that there are just about 9 or 10 of these keys before the operator, and the operator has no change of vision before her throughout the day or all through the work, but has to stick to the little keyboard. There is no change for dictation; there is no change such as comes to a typewriter operator in all the different kinds of activity that the typewriter operator has to follow. And comparing it to working in coal, the man who puts the coal in his basket, or whatever it is, and then carries it to a certain place and dumps it, and handles the shovel and different implements, has some kind of a change going on all the time.

But those employees down there have to stick to one little spot and keep one particular line of punchers going there all the time with a very small machine and a very slight perspective.

In this city the Welfare League have taken the matter up, and they have gone down there and considered the condition of these girls; and it is distressing and wrong, the way they are rushing the work. As was said here to-day, they have taken some one out of there afflicted with St. Vitus's dance. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] stated that the old ones are eliminated, and he referred to that as a fact in connection with these machines.

Of course a method that eliminates all of those who have passed beyond the prime of life, and who are subjected to a slight weariness from long service, will perhaps make a few dollars more to the Government, but I do not believe that this Government ought to introduce that piece-rate system in its various departments. I believe it is wrong to encourage the operation in the way it is encouraged down there in the office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department. I am not opposed to the machines, but I am opposed to the piecework system. [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I realize that the hour is late and that the House wants to quit, but I want to say a word about this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, virtually all of the employees in the Post Office Department are paid flat or graded salaries. There are a few exceptions. In the star-route service we let the routes out by contract. When the Rural Free Delivery System was established an attempt was made to put the service on rural routes under a similar contract system. This House and the Senate would not stand for it, and we have since paid the rural carriers on the basis of a flat salary, which is the proper way. The same thing is true of the railway mail clerks, a very skilled class of employees, working, many of them, on high tension. The same thing is true of the city carriers. The same thing is true of practically all of the employees up in the Post Office Department. Now, here is one bureau in the department where another system has been inaugurated, a piecework system.

Mr. FITZGERALD. These people are in the Treasury Department.

Mr. MURDOCK. They are connected with the Post Office Department, because they are in the office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department, though they are in the Treasury Department. But they work on postal affairs and audit postal accounts.

Now, the statement has been made here to-day both by the gentleman from New York and by the gentleman from Illinois that they are against the misuse of the piecework system. I am against it. I do not agree with the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS], if I understand him rightly. I am against a system the basis of which is to drive the workman to his limit, usually by the use of a pacemaker. Now, I do not know who owns these machines. If they are owned by a private corporation, the private corporation probably furnishes to the Government these cards, and——

Mr. FITZGERALD. That makes no difference.

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, it makes all the difference in the world. Then it becomes of advantage to the private corporation to have these machines speeded up to the limit, for the purpose of showing their efficiency to the Government; and if the private corporation has that motive, then you may be sure that the women up there who are doing this work are, as I said before in the course of this debate, driven to the maximum of work. And that is the trouble with piecework generally. The gentleman from Maryland must know that in the installation of labor-saving machines piecework usually passes. It passes because it is unfair. It would not pass usually at the instance of the employer. It passes because the workmen will not stand for it.

Now, why should this Government put before the country an example in the use of this infamous system? Why should Congress stand for it? We are not trying to exclude from the department labor-saving machinery. We are trying to exclude from the Government the use of this piecework system. I hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. J. I. NOLAN] will be adopted. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. J. I. NOLAN].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BRYAN. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 23, noes 31.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California demands tellers. All those in favor of taking this vote by tellers will please rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Ten Members; not a sufficient number.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count.

Mr. MANN. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from South Carolina that he move that the committee rise.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I do not care to punish Members. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15279) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BURGESS, for 15 days, on account of serious illness in his family.

To Mr. BROWN of West Virginia, for 10 days, on account of sickness.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 1044. An act for the relief of Byron W. Canfield; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 55. An act for the relief of Daniel Hampton; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 4968. An act for the relief of Hyacinthe Villeneuve; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, April 8, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. WATSON, from the Committee on the Territories, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9770) to levy and collect an income tax on railroads in Alaska, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 509), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. FALCONER: A bill (H. R. 15430) to prohibit selling of intoxicating beverages in the Territory of Alaska; to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. EDMONDS: A bill (H. R. 15431) for the construction of passenger vessels of fireproof material; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska: A bill (H. R. 15432) to provide for drainage of allotted and tribal lands of the Omaha and Winnebago Indians located within the boundaries of any district in the State of Nebraska; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. MOORE: A bill (H. R. 15433) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the Masonic homes property at Elizabethtown, Pa., four brass or bronze cannon or fieldpieces, with their carriages, and a suitable outfit of cannon balls; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma: A bill (H. R. 15434) prohibiting the granting of liquor licenses near street car transfer corners; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. STEENERSON: A bill (H. R. 15435) for the relief of certain purchasers of land under the act entitled "An act to authorize the drainage of certain lands in the State of Minnesota"; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. MAHAN: A bill (H. R. 15436) authorizing the acquisition of a site and the construction of a public building thereon at Putnam, Conn., and amending the public-buildings act of June 25, 1910; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. HENRY: Concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 35) directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate and report facts regarding ownership, organization, operation, and rates of vessels and steamship lines engaged in transporting freight between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. CALLAWAY: Resolution (H. Res. 460) to print as a House document the report of the Government engineers on the Lake Superior-Mississippi River Canal; to the Committee on Printing.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ALLEN: A bill (H. R. 15437) granting a pension to Lydia F. Stewart; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CLAYPOOL: A bill (H. R. 15438) granting an increase of pension to Alexander F. Herman; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DICKINSON: A bill (H. R. 15439) granting a pension to J. Walter Craig; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15440) granting a pension to John Welsh; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DIXON: A bill (H. R. 15441) granting a pension to Evaline Wilson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15442) granting an increase of pension to John W. Amos; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15443) granting an increase of pension to Caroline Davis; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15444) granting an increase of pension to Christina Leibecke; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DOREMUS: A bill (H. R. 15445) granting an increase of pension to Jerome Stoll; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FIELDS: A bill (H. R. 15446) granting an increase of pension to John H. Ellis; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15447) granting an increase of pension to Mary M. Wright; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FORDNEY: A bill (H. R. 15448) granting an increase of pension to Paphiras B. Keys; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FREAR: A bill (H. R. 15449) granting an increase of pension to Leonard Loken; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GOEKE: A bill (H. R. 15450) granting an increase of pension to Robert H. Calkins; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HAY: A bill (H. R. 15451) for the relief of the heirs of Samuel C. Hull, deceased; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HOWARD: A bill (H. R. 15452) for the relief of the heirs of A. K. Tribble, deceased; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. JACOWAY: A bill (H. R. 15453) granting an increase of pension to George W. Plank; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15454) granting an increase of pension to James R. Power; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 8, 1914.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, who dost from Thy throne behold all the dwellers upon earth, grant us the continual replenishing of Thy Holy Spirit that we may faithfully discharge the duties of the high and holy calling to which Thou hast called us and execute the trust that Thou hast committed to our hands with an eye single to Thy glory. Grant us a heart turning always for its instruction and guidance to God. All our blessing is but the fulfillment of the covenant that God has made with His people. So may we keep the covenant with God and do Thy will and glorify Thy name. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented petitions of sundry citizens of Hillsdale, Saginaw, St. Johns, Almont, Onsted, Evarts, Bloomingdale, Dexter, Elk Rapids, Owosso, and Hudson, all in the State of Michigan; of sundry citizens of Peru, Portland, Greensburg, Lapel, and North Manchester, all in the State of Indiana; of sundry citizens of Bradford, Ohio; and of sundry citizens of Kings Mountain, N. Mr. VARDAMAN. I send to the desk a protest from the Board of Trade of Vicksburg, Miss., against the enlargement of the weight limit for parcel-post shipments. I ask that it be read and appropriately referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the communication.

The communication was read and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, as follows:

BOARD OF TRADE,
Vicksburg, Miss., April 6, 1914.

Hon. JAMES K. VARDAMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am directed by the board of trade to ask that you do whatever you can to prevent at present the enlargement of the weight limit for parcel-post shipments from 50 pounds to 100 pounds.

The entire Parcel Post Service is experimental in this country, and our organization is inclined to think that, for the present at least, it should not be so extended as to include the carrying of shipments greater in maximum weight than 50 pounds.

While fully recognizing that the express companies, by arbitrary and often unjust exactions, created the necessity for the parcel post, we still feel that the express companies are necessary utilities, and fear the effect on them of further extension of the parcel-post system until they have had an opportunity of adjusting themselves to the new conditions developed by the institution of the parcel-post system.

The express service has, of course, some very definite advantages over the parcel-post system. It collects from shippers packages to be forwarded, as the parcel post does not, and it pays the cost of articles damaged while in transit, as the parcel post does not. As you know, parcel post only pays for articles lost in transit when insured.

Yours, truly,

FRANK H. ANDREWS, Secretary.

Mr. THOMPSON presented a petition of Walnut Creek Grange, No. 1294, Patrons of Husbandry, of Paola, Kans., praying for the adoption of a system of rural credits, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. JONES. I have a telegram in the nature of a memorial from J. J. Donovan, of Bellingham, representing prominent business men of our State, protesting against the repeal of the tolls provision of the Panama Canal act, and also a telegram in the nature of a memorial from J. B. Best, president of the Commercial Club of Everett, Wash., protesting against the repeal of that provision of the act. I move that the telegrams be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in view of the fiasco of the test of coal at Bering River for the Navy, and in connection with the expedition which was recently sent to the Matanuska fields in Alaska to secure coal for testing for the same purpose, I present a petition recently framed by citizens of Knik, Alaska, in reference to the coal that is being taken out of the Matanuska fields. As it is brief and this is a current matter, I ask that it be read.

There being no objection, the petition was read and referred to the Committee on Territories, as follows:

To Dr. JOSEPH A. HOLMES,
Bureau of Mines, Washington, D. C.:

Be it remembered that at a public mass meeting held at Knik, Alaska, on March 3, 1914, in the Knik Public Hall, the following resolution was unanimously adopted and the undersigned were appointed a committee to reduce said resolution to writing:

"Whereas the Matanuska coal has been successfully transported to tidewater by Mr. Jack Dalton, after overcoming natural and artificial opposition; and

"Whereas the citizens of Knik are desirous of said coal getting a square deal while being stored and in being transported from its landing place to the ship upon which it is to be tested; and

"Whereas the meeting expressed its lack of confidence in Mr. John W. Swift, the present disbursing officer, as to being able and willing to have said coal gotten out safely: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the citizens of Knik, in public mass meeting assembled, respectfully request that said coal be placed in charge of some trustworthy watchman, so that it can not be tampered with, and that some responsible person, in whom the citizens of Alaska have confidence, be placed in charge of transporting said coal from its landing place to the ship, where same is to be tested in order that said coal may safely reach its destination in its natural state, and it is further requested that some other person than the present disbursing officer, Mr. John W. Swift, be given charge of having said coal watched and transported.

employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

CHARLESTON (S. C.) COALING STATION.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, on March 10 I introduced a resolution (S. Res. 291) which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, before which the resolution is now pending. It relates to a very important matter, both to the Navy and to the people of the South.

I send to the desk and ask to have read a letter from Mr. Benjamin L. Dulaney, of Bristol, Tenn., which will show just how important it is to have this investigation made promptly and thoroughly. It shows how the southern coal miners are discriminated against and how the southern people are also unjustly treated on the rates on coal from the Appalachian fields. There can be no just reason why coal should not be carried to tidewater on the Atlantic coast south of Cape Hatteras at as cheap rate as it is carried north of Hatteras.

When the facts are brought out, as I hope they will be, by the Naval Committee, the Congress will know just what to do to grant relief to our people.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading of the letter? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

MARCH 25, 1914.

Senator B. R. TILLMAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The most important question to the industrial world is transportation. By the control of the transportation of this country one can build up or break down any section regardless of its natural advantages. It is well known that the transportation of this country is controlled by a small group of financiers, mainly in New York. But while they control the transportation of the whole country, their ownership of industrial enterprises is limited to certain parts of the country, as, for example, the coal industry of Pennsylvania and some other sections; and hence the flagrant abuses in the practices of rate making to favor their own coal and to destroy the independent coal mines.

In the matter of coal freight rates, I think the most abused States in the Union are North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, and a portion of Virginia. The industrial progress of these States has been in spite of the high cost of fuel transportation, and it ought to be clear to everyone of intelligence that general manufacturing can not prosper until transportation conditions have been corrected. By an examination of the rate sheets, open to all, it will be seen that the average manufacturer located on the Pennsylvania system, for example, pays from 30 to 60 per cent less freight on fuel than is paid by the average manufacturer on the Southern Railway—that is, for haulage for equal distance. For example:

Compare rates to Columbus, Ohio, with rates to Columbia, S. C.:

	Miles.	Rate.
To Columbus from Pocahontas	334	$1.15
To Columbia from Appalachia	318	2.25

Compare rates to Toledo, Ohio, with rates to Savannah, Ga.:

	Miles.	Rate.
To Toledo from Pocahontas	456	$1.45
To Savannah from Appalachia	471	2.10

Compare rates to Cincinnati, Ohio, with rates to Lynchburg, Va.:

	Miles.	Rate.
To Cincinnati from Pocahontas	340	$1.10
To Lynchburg from Pocahontas	169	1.50

Compare rates to Cleveland, Ohio, with rates to Charleston, S. C.:

	Miles.	Rate.
To Cleveland from Pocahontas	472	$1.35
To Charleston, S. C., from Appalachia	447	2.05

Compare rates to Dayton, Ohio, with rates to Winston-Salem, N. C.:

	Miles.	Rate.
To Dayton from Pocahontas	364	$1.35
To Winston-Salem from Pocahontas	239	2.10

Compare rates to Indianapolis, Ind., with rates to Augusta, Ga.:

	Miles.	Rate.
To Indianapolis from Pocahontas	449	$1.65
To Augusta from Appalachia	401	2.20

Compare rates to Detroit, Mich., with rates to Charlotte, N. C.:

	Miles.	Rate.
To Detroit from Pocahontas	505	$1.60
To Charlotte from Appalachia	305	2.25

Where there are two or more routes the short mileage is used.

The evident purpose of these high rates, especially to the coast towns and cities, is not to raise revenue for the Southern Railway, but to prohibit the movement of coal by it from the mines on its own rails to tidewater, for if the independent coal shippers had access to tidewater with proper coal-loading facilities there would be competition with the Coal Trust from Florida to Maine as well as in the export business; and, moreover, the coast towns and cities from Charleston to Tampa are forced to buy much of their coal from the Coal Trust from mines a thousand miles away, and thus several millions of dollars are annually sent away, and the Southern Railway is robbed of its natural rights to haul the coal and is thus used by its directors to obstruct development in the territory that supports and protects it. These things are wrong, and such practices in rate making are unfair and without justification from any point of view. The Southern Railway is a splendid property, and if it were run in its own interest and for the development and benefit of the territory in which it is located there is no just reason why every seaport from Jacksonville to Norfolk should not have as low tidewater rates as are now enjoyed in the domain of the Coal Trust at the seaports from Norfolk to New York, for it has its own rails reaching directly from the coal mines in Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Alabama directly to Norfolk, Charleston, Brunswick, and Jacksonville.

I believe that it is a conservative estimate to say that the mines from Virginia to Alabama reached directly by the Southern Railway could furnish now at the rate of 10,000,000 tons per annum for tidewater business, and this tonnage could be increased at an enormous annual rate if the operators were only certain of their position. This would increase the gross revenues of the Southern Railway by $14,000,000, assuming that the tidewater rate of $1.40 would be put in, and when you add to the freight item the value of the coal itself, at a low estimate the amount would be $25,000,000 annually that would remain in the territory served by the Southern Railway, and this total should increase annually for many years to come if the Southern Railway has a square deal. The average distance from mines on the Southern Railway to tidewater is practically the same as from the mines on the Norfolk & Western Railway and the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad to tidewater, and the two latter roads have grown rich and powerful by the movement of coal at rates low enough to assure the movement of coal, and there is simply no good reason why the Southern Railway should not do likewise, but this road, as is well known, is controlled by the same financiers who control the big coal interests known as the Coal Trust, and some of them were identified with the recent scandal in connection with the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, and it is claimed that they control practically every railroad in the South.

I allege with emphasis that, in addition to the wrongs above recited against the southern country, not only the Southern Railway but the Norfolk & Western Railway as well are being used to destroy private interests, specifically some of the independent coal properties in the territory, and I believe that an honest investigation will prove this statement beyond the shadow of a doubt. For many years I have been engaged in development work in that territory and have had a good deal of experience in dealing with some of these financiers who control the Southern Railway. Some of their valuable properties are those which I developed and which they obtained by methods that I think should put to shame an ordinary train robber or a bandit. I am now responsible for an investment of probably $5,000,000 in what is known as the Black Mountain coal field, which is literally held up and refused an outlet for its product, though reached directly by the Southern Railway, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, and is within a few miles of the Norfolk & Western Railway. The investment and the development in this field were induced largely by the promises made by the Southern Railway to give an outlet at Charleston, and though the Southern has had its line completed from the coal mines to Charleston for 10 years, no outlet has been provided.

I believe a thorough investigation by a Senate committee will show that the Southern Railway has been the dumping ground for the sale of other railroads at unreasonable profits by the friends or business associates of some of the directors. I have personal knowledge of the sale of the Virginia & Southwestern Railway by Henry K. McHarg at practically six times what it cost him or his company, when the Southern Railway could just as well have bought it directly and saved the five millions. I believe that an investigation will show that such transactions, amounting to probably $50,000,000 or more, have taken place since the control by the present financiers.

I believe that a thorough investigation will show that the abnormally high local rates throughout the Southern territory are due in a large measure to the need of revenues to meet such purchases and to the inflation of capital and bond issues caused thereby.

I believe that an investigation will show the existence of a secret rate-making association, and that all important freight rates in the territory in question are dominated by the Pennsylvania Railroad greatly to the detriment of all the other railroads involved and unfair to the country they traverse.

I believe that an investigation properly conducted will show that the men who control the Southern Railway have practically no investment either in the Southern Railway itself or in the territory served by it, except in a small portion of Virginia and Alabama.

In the matter of handling the several bond issues of the railway and the short loans these men, as is well known, have been on both sides of the transaction. I believe that this investigation should be made in the interest of the security holders, as well as in the interest of the railroad itself, and particularly in the interest of the territory which the railroad serves.

In conclusion, let me say that these conditions have taken shape and grown from bad to worse under the very eyes of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and hence I suppose that body is powerless to give relief, and therefore I earnestly urge you not to favor a reference of the Tillman resolution to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Very truly, yours,

B. L. DULANEY.

LOCATION OF FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I ask to have read at the desk resolutions passed at a big mass meeting of citizens of New Orleans on the night of the 4th instant, protesting against what they believe to be the unfair location of Federal reserve banks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolutions of mass meeting of the citizens of New Orleans, protesting against the unfair location of Federal reserve banks and the injection of politics into the national banking system.

At a mass meeting of the citizens of New Orleans, convened upon a joint call issued by the New Orleans Clearing House Association, New Orleans Association of Commerce, New Orleans Board of Trade, New Orleans Stock Exchange, New Orleans Sugar Exchange, New Orleans Contractors and Dealers' Exchange, and New Orleans Real Estate Auction Exchange, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted by a rising vote:

"Whereas the Federal reserve act constituted the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Comptroller of the Currency as a 'reserve bank organization committee,' for the purpose of locating the Federal reserve banks and outlining the Federal reserve districts;

"Whereas that act expressly provided that the Federal reserve cities and the Federal reserve districts should be apportioned with due regard to the convenience and customary course of business within the United States and with foreign countries, and expressly provided that an investigation should be made by the organization committee in order fairly to ascertain what the said convenience and customary course of trade might be;

"Whereas the said organization committee made such an investigation as was required by the statute creating it, and thereby secured valuable information as to the magnitude, importance, convenience, and customary course of the business of the various sections of the country, and as to the proper location of the reserve cities and the reserve districts contemplated by the act;

"Whereas said committee, instead of locating the reserve cities and reserve districts in accordance with the convenient and customary course of business, as pointed out in unmistakable terms by their investigation, has proceeded in many instances to locate and designate those cities and districts in utter and absolute disregard of the evident convenience and customary course of business, and in utter and absolute disregard of the just claims of certain important cities and communities, which claims are predicated upon convenience, customary course of business, population, commercial importance, geographical position, and financial requirements and capabilities;

"Whereas the action so taken in those cases indicates only too plainly that the conclusions reached were arrived at not by a careful and impartial consideration of the merits of the claims of the respective parties, given with an eye single to the greatest good for the greatest number, but were reached and based upon considerations of political expediency or personal interest and aggrandizement;

"Whereas the fact that politics and the false guide of personal interests have entered into the conclusions reached unmistakably appears from the selection of Richmond, with a meager population of 127,628 and a total of banking resources of $50,000,000, and making tributary to this comparatively unimportant mart of trade the cities of Baltimore and Washington, the former with its population of 558,485 and its local banking resources of $309,669,000, and the latter with its prestige and importance as a national capital, to which is added a population of 331,069 and banking resources of $110,081,000; the selection of Atlanta, a city in Georgia, with a population of not more than 154,839 and a total of banking resources amounting to $48,000,000 and serving only a purely local territory, a city self-confessedly unable, without assistance, to support a reserve bank, and the making subservient to this comparatively unimportant city so large and important a city as New Orleans, the metropolis of the South, the second port of the whole United States, the largest manufacturing center in the South—its manufactures being greater by more than $18,000,000 than the total manufactures of Dallas and Atlanta combined—the key to, the dominant factor of, and the acknowledged financial center of the vast valley of the lower Mississippi, a city whose population of 339,075 is one and one-third times the combined populations of Dallas and Atlanta, whose banking capital is more than $1,000,000 greater than the combined capital of the banks of Dallas and Atlanta, whose banking resources of $104,829,110 is greater by $14,829,110 than the combined banking resources of Dallas and Atlanta, whose assessed valuation is one and one-third times as great as the assessed valuations of Dallas and Atlanta combined, whose enormous tributary country, whose early development of important banks and unrivaled banking history, whose position as the premier port of the Gulf of Mexico, the only seaboard which has been deprived entirely of recognition, whose presently tremendous and steadily increasing foreign trade through the Panama Canal and otherwise, with its necessarily tremendous volume of foreign bills and attendant banking requirements, and whose acknowledged ability to support and care for a reserve bank alike demanded the location within its borders of such a bank; the arbitrary outlining of a reserve district in such a way as to cut off from New Orleans the greater part of its own convenient and tributary State of Louisiana, and the thrusting of that city as an adjunct into a district the greater part of which it normally and customarily leads; the thrusting of the remainder of the State of Louisiana, customarily tributary to New Orleans, into an alien and distant reserve district, in contravention of its inclination, its convenience, its natural course of trade, its customs since time immemorial, and its logical channels of finance;

"Whereas the foundation of the banking system of this great country, not upon the firm rock of its own inherent merit and applicability to the needs of the whole people, but upon the moving sands of the temporary demands of political faction must necessarily result in disaster to the commerce and industry of the country and danger to our republican institutions: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the confidence of this community in the entire proposed banking system as a system founded on an earnest effort to meet the needs of the whole people, without regard to geographical location or political affiliation, and administered by impartial heads without bias or partisanship, is rocked and rent to its very foundation stone; that this community sees in a money power thus utilized in its inception to pay political debts and forge political fetters a menace to this Republic far more overwhelming than that which threatened the United States of Andrew Jackson, and caused the dissolution of the Bank of the United States; that this community forsees the upbuilding in this country of ours of a plutocracy having at its command the vast financial resources of the Government, using those resources to increase its power and to maintain its sway, a plutocracy deaf to reason, blind to justice, scornful of right; that this citizenship now rises to crush in its infancy such an octopus and demands without delay a congressional investigation of the methods used and of the influences brought to bear upon the reserve bank organization committee, and a relocation of the reserve districts and cities in accordance with the just requirements of the business of the country and the provisions of the currency act; that this community demands in no uncertain terms that the reserve bank organization committee be taught once and for all time that they serve and do not dominate, that their law is the welfare of the State, not the welfare of their personal friends and political allies; that they are an instrument, not an autocrat; that they are not greater than but subservient to the people who created them; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to the President of these United States, the reserve bank organization committee, the Senators from Louisiana, the Congressmen from Louisiana, the Members of the United States Senate, the Members of the House of Representatives, and the public press."

NEW ORLEANS, LA., April 4, 1914.

Mr. RANSDELL. I ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD, without reading, the statement made by Mr. Sol Wexler before the regional bank committee, representing the city of New Orleans, a statement which was filed on the 11th of February, and also a letter of February 28, 1914 (addressed by him to Mr. McAdoo, chairman of the committee on organization of regional banks). I do not ask that these papers be read, but simply that they may be published in connection with the resolutions.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Louisiana will not press that request. The statements he desires printed constitute an argument made in behalf of the city of New Orleans, and ought not to go into the RECORD. The resolutions which have been read were printed on yesterday in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, when one of the largest editions ever published of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD appeared. I can hardly see the wisdom of inserting these documents in the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I have a statement from Virginia bankers regarding the location of the reserve banks; and if one is to be published, all of them ought to go in. It seems to me that the Senator's request is one which should not be pressed.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not desire to make an unreasonable request; but the people of New Orleans are very much stirred up over this proposition. This is a dignified argument, not a long one, made by Mr. Sol Wexler, one of the greatest bankers in the United States, and addressed to the committee on organization of regional banks. I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate to read the document. It comprises several pages, and would take some time; but it does explain the position of New Orleans, and I think, in order that its position may be clearly known before the country, the statement should be printed. I hope there will be no objection. I certainly do not object to statements in regard to other cities being published.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am compelled to object to the printing of arguments of that character in the RECORD.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Virginia to the fact that this is a question before the country as to whether the law has been carried out. Congress passed a law providing that in establishing the regional reserve banks and in establishing the boundaries of the districts the board should observe the customary and convenient course of business. Those were not idle words; they were put in the law for a purpose. I am not standing here to-day to deny that substantially the spirit of the law has been observed; but there are many who do question that statement, and I think it would be proper to put into the RECORD the arguments made by every city seeking to show the ordinary course of business and the facts which sustain its contention; in fact, I would be willing to go so far as to support a resolution by the Senate calling upon the organization committee to furnish the Senate with the facts and the evidence which have led the committee to decide upon the cities and the districts named.

I think it is a serious question, once raised, whether this organization committee has carried out the letter and the spirit of the law; and when a question is raised by organizations in different parts of the country, by cities in different parts of the country, and by bankers in different parts of the country to the effect that in some cases the organization as proposed will result in a dislocation of the banking custom of the country it is proper for the Congress to take cognizance of those complaints. I hope the Senator from Virginia will not object to having this matter go into the RECORD.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, if all these arguments are put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD they will make a volume as big as a year's issue of the congressional debates.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I certainly hope the Senator is not going to press his objection. He can not keep things out of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by making an objection. He can prevent this statement from going in now, as a matter of course, but it is going into the RECORD before this is over. I thought I was adopting a simple form that would not bother the Senate much when I asked to have these matters, so far as they relate to New Orleans, inserted in the RECORD without taking the time of the Senate to read them. No one was listening when these spicy resolutions were read a few moments ago. Unfortunately, a great many of us do not listen to what goes on in the Senate, but many of us read the RECORD as made, and it seems to me that if this RECORD can be made now in connection with the resolutions, that is the logical and proper way to make it. If it is not done, of course, I will have to do the best I can to get the matter in later.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, nobody, of course, can prevent the Senator from reading the statement and letter to which he refers; but my object is simply to keep from burdening the RECORD with an enormous mass of matter. I have here the arguments submitted by Virginia bankers, and there are other papers submitted by them in addition.

I think the city of New Orleans has gotten a little hysterical. She has taken herself too seriously. I think she will get over this in a few days. The general muster of New Orleans appears to have taken this matter up. We have heard a good deal about appeals from judicial decisions, and now we have an appeal from a judicial tribunal to the general muster. A mass meeting in New Orleans has met together to denounce the sworn officers of the law—able, honorable, and high-toned men—and to impeach their patriotism, their fidelity, and their integrity, as well as their ability. I think, as I have said, that the citizens of New Orleans have taken themselves a little seriously, and I feel that if we are to indulge the city of New Orleans by putting in the RECORD everything she wants to say——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What the Senator objects to has already gone into the RECORD. I was not advocating putting into the RECORD an attack upon the officials who have been charged with the duty of locating these districts. What I asked to have go into the RECORD and what I understand the Senator from Louisiana asked to have go into the RECORD is the written argument heretofore made by the city of New Orleans, and the arguments that may have been presented by the city of Pittsburgh and other cities which have gathered data for the purpose of showing the usual course of their banking transactions.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is exactly correct, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is not an attempt to put into the RECORD an attack on the reserve board. It is an attempt to put into the RECORD the arguments and the statements showing the course of banking transactions in different parts of the country, so that we will have officially stated here the various arguments and the numerous data used by the reserve board in reaching its conclusion.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, in this particular case this argument was made and filed on the 11th of February, more than two months ago, and a supplemental letter on the 28th of February, so there is certainly nothing in it that can be offensive to anybody.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I was not making an objection on that ground.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is utterly impossible for Senators upon this side of the Chamber to hear the controversy that is going on upon the other side, and we are very anxious to hear it. Therefore I ask for order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a little hard for the Chair to tell which side is creating the confusion this morning. The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Louisiana. It seems to me that if this matter is printed as a public document it will be more available, and can be used much better, than if it is published in the RECORD. It would be far better for the Senate and far better for those who desire to use it in the future, and it seems to me it would answer all purposes to have it printed as a public document. Things of this kind are usually printed as public documents and not published in the RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. In answer to the Senator from Virginia, if the Senator from New Hampshire will pardon me, I should like to say that it is all right to publish it as a public document, and I should be very glad to have it in that shape; but if it is to be of any avail at all it should reach the American people, not the few thousand people who will be reached by having it printed as a public document. We never publish more than a few thousand copies of a public document. If this argument be of any avail at all, I want it to reach the American people. As the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] says, it is a cold, business-like statement of the facts, comparing New Orleans with other cities which at that time New Orleans conceived to be its rivals. It is in no sense an attack upon anyone.

As suggested by my very urbane friend from Virginia, I am sorry that he is a little upset at what the people of New Orleans are doing. They did have a big mass meeting down there. They are justly indignant, in my humble opinion, at the course taken by the Federal Reserve Board, and they are going to exercise the rights of American citizens by protesting against that action. They propose to get this matter settled finally by the full commission of seven. It has not been settled definitely yet. The law contemplates that the full board shall settle it, and they are trying to lay before the American people the foundation for taking up the matter before the full board. I think they have a right to do it, and they are proceeding in what I conceive to be a dignified manner. If I had drawn the resolutions, perhaps I would have left out some of the expressions that are used; but that is not for me to say.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I consider the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as intended to contain a record of the debates in the Senate. I think we depart too often from that rule. I am certainly not willing for the arguments of individuals throughout the Nation on the creation of these reserve districts to be inserted in the daily RECORD. If the Senator chooses to read this matter, he has the right; but I shall object to it going in otherwise. If one goes in, all ought to go in, and none will go in with my consent. I object to it going into the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, a moment ago the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] rose and asked for order in the Chamber, and said that Senators upon that side were very much interested in the spectacle now presented by this side.

The Senator from Iowa was exactly right. The poor, dear, old, foolish Democratic Party is going through the same game that she can be generally trusted to go through with soon after she gets into power. Here we Democrats are quarreling with one another because this or that or the other city was not made a reserve city.

Why, if the Apostles were here and had constituted a board and attempted to designate the reserve cities for this system, there would have been indignation meetings held somewhere and words of scurrility and violence would have been uttered at those meetings.

I love New Orleans. All of my people do business with her. In not designating her to a certain extent the people of my immediate section have been hurt. None of us do business with Atlanta. Atlanta is farther off from us than New York in all commercial senses.

Suppose, however, New Orleans had been designated and Atlanta left out. Both could not very well have been designated without giving the South too much. What would have been the result as regards northern Georgia, northern Alabama, and various parts of the section included? They would have been in the same fix that my people are in now.

We Democrats stand here and we quarrel with one another, and mass meetings are held in New Orleans by Democrats, and this thing occurred which would be absolutely inconceivable if it had not happened—they became so indignant, they became so violent in their language, they became so unreasonable and illogical that they passed resolutions calling upon one of the Senators from that State to vote against the bill repealing the exemption of coastwise ships from tolls, because of what? Because the board has not made New Orleans a reserve city.

That is the Democratic Party; that is its history; that is what led old Tom Reed to say in 1894 and 1895—

> You can not last long because you are not accustomed to governing anybody or anything; you can not govern the country; you can not even govern yourselves; you are incompetent.

The Senator from Iowa was exactly right, fellow Democrats.

If the so-called argument of one of these towns to be designated as a reserve city is to go into the RECORD or into a public document, every one of them will seek to pursue the same course. Memphis, the city that does business with northern Mississippi and northwestern Alabama and Arkansas, will seek it. Some town in Texas may; Pittsburgh will. If they had succeeded, the others would have done so.

Here we stand quarreling with one another because a board of sworn officials, honest men—nobody charges them with being guided by any corrupt or ulterior motives—in trying to do their duty have not pleased everybody. The Senator from Iowa is right.

These arguments were, as I understand, made before this subboard, were they not?

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then if this publishing is to be done at all it ought to be done in this way: There ought to be a resolution calling upon this board to furnish us, to be published as a public document, all the arguments made before it, and its report, and the reasons which led to its report, and not indulge in these unseemly wrangles here every morning between Democrats for priority of insertion of irrelevant matter in the RECORD.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, may I suggest a question to the Senator?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will ask the Senator if he does not think the information contained in the arguments of these various cities seeking to have a Federal reserve bank would be a great deal more readable than much of the material that does appear in the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and contain a great deal more genuine information to the American people?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, in answer to that question I will say that I would find difficulty in finding anything that was ever uttered or ever printed that would not be more entertaining than some things that go into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. [Laughter.] That has nothing to do with this, however. It has nothing to do with it. Now, I say if you are going to take any course of this sort at all the right course is to call upon this board to publish as a public document or send to us to be published as a public document all the arguments made by everybody before them, the board's conclusion, and their reasons for it, and let that public document go to the people for their information and for the information of the full board, if that board should take up the matter for review. This is not the right way to do it. This is doing no good in the world that I can see except encouraging the sneers and the laughter of people who think us incompetent to govern—incapacitated by lack of cohesion for the governing business.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have prepared from the briefs submitted by the Chamber of Commerce and the Clearing House Association of Atlanta a short reply to the resolutions passed by the citizens of New Orleans. It is no longer than the resolutions sent to the desk by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], and which were read. As a matter of justice, I ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

A committee representing the Clearing House Association and Chamber of Commerce of the City of Atlanta presented elaborate briefs to the organization committee charged with the duty of selecting reserve cities in support of the claim that a reserve district should be created in the southeastern section of the United States and that the reserve bank should be located at Atlanta.

The facts stated in this reply to the resolutions criticizing the action of the reserve board organization committee, passed at New Orleans, are obtained from the briefs of the Atlanta committee, with the exception of the comparison of the population of Atlanta and New Orleans, which figures are from the census reports.

The statement in the New Orleans resolutions that Atlanta has a population of not more than 154,839 is unfounded. The census report shows that the population of Atlanta from 1900 to 1910 increased at the rate of 75 per cent. No one familiar with the growth of this city will doubt that the percentage of increase since 1910 has been even greater. Atlanta now has a population of between 210,000 and 220,000. While Atlanta increased in population from 1900 to 1910 at the rate of 75 per cent, New Orleans increased at the rate of only 18 per cent. With these percentages of growth continued, it will not be a great while until the population of Atlanta exceeds that of New Orleans.

The national banking capital and surplus of Atlanta now exceeds that of New Orleans. The national banking capital and surplus of Atlanta is $8,600,000; that of New Orleans only $6,730,000. The national banking capital of Atlanta increased from 1903 to 1913 400 per cent. The national banking capital of New Orleans increased from 1903 to 1913, 17⅛ per cent. With the national banking capital of Atlanta increasing at the rate of 400 per cent in 10 years and that of New Orleans increasing only 17⅛ per cent in 10 years, Atlanta already has more national banking capital than New Orleans, and will contribute $113,000 more to the capital stock of the reserve bank than will New Orleans.

Georgia has a national banking capital and surplus of $24,615,910. It will contribute one-third of the capital stock to the reserve bank of the sixth district.

How unreasonable it would have been to decline placing the reserve bank in the State which contributes much more to the capital stock of the reserve bank than any other State in the district and which has in it the city which will contribute more to the capital of the reserve bank than any city in the district!

In the past 10 years the deposits in the Atlanta national banks have increased 500 per cent, and their clearings 600 per cent. Their percentages of increase have been more than ten times as large as those of New Orleans during this period. The individual deposits, the loans and discounts, and the clearings of the national banks of Atlanta are now larger than those of the national banks of New Orleans.

Georgia is the largest State in area east of the Mississippi. According to statistics recently prepared by the Manufacturers' Record, of Baltimore, it is the fourth largest State in agricultural productions in the Union. It is the second largest south of the Ohio River, Texas being the largest.

The agricultural and manufacturing industries of the State are most varied, and their growth during the last 10 years have not been exceeded by that of any State in the Union. The suggestion that Atlanta serves purely local territory and is confessedly unable, without assistance, to support a reserve bank is without foundation. Atlanta serves the entire South, as does no other city in the South. No city south of the Potomac or west of the Mississippi can by itself support a reserve bank. The national banks of New Orleans will subscribe only one-tenth of the capital stock required for the reserve bank. The national banks of Atlanta will subscribe more to the capital stock of the reserve bank than will those in New Orleans.

The act providing for the establishment of the Federal reserve banks requires the organization committee to consider "convenience and customary course of business."

CONVENIENCE.

This term applies to facilities for reaching the different parts of the district from the city in which the reserve bank is located. Atlanta has 152 trains which come in or go out each day. They go to every part of the district, and every part of the district can be reached from Atlanta, and Atlanta can be reached from every part of the district between the times when the banks close in the afternoon and when they open in the morning. The only exception to this statement must be made with reference to banks in southern Florida, and these banks can reach Atlanta with greater convenience than they can reach New Orleans. These passenger trains are also mail trains, and Atlanta furnishes the most convenient opportunity by mail to reach and to be reached from every part of the district.

CUSTOMARY COURSE OF BUSINESS.

The great advantage that Atlanta has in convenience has made Atlanta for this entire section the headquarters for the ordinary course of business. Atlanta is the great market of the southeastern region. Its commerce of over $340,000,000 annually in the States east of the Mississippi is not equaled or approached by any other city in that section. Atlanta is the headquarters for the insurance business of the entire South, being the fourth largest insurance center in the United States. At Atlanta the railroads of the southeastern section have located their headquarters. At Atlanta the headquarters of the Southeastern Passenger Association, extending from the Potomac and Ohio Rivers and the Mississippi and the Atlantic Ocean, are located. At Atlanta the headquarters of the Southeastern Freight Bureau are located. At Atlanta the Southern Weighing and Inspection Bureau, covering the same territory, are located. At Atlanta the headquarters of the telephone system for the same section are located. At Atlanta the headquarters for the telegraph companies for the same section are located. At Atlanta the headquarters of the express companies for the South are located. At Atlanta the headquarters for agents, between 450 and 500 in number, of all important manufacturers and commercial houses of the United States doing business in the South are located.

Our National Government recognized Atlanta as the center of this section and located the headquarters of the Railway Mail Service for the section at Atlanta. The headquarters of the military department of the Government for the section are located at Atlanta, and Atlanta has been designated as the headquarters for the new Bureau of Commerce for the section.

After a careful study of the entire territory, based upon convenience and accessibility, the Federal prison for the entire territory east of the Rockies and south of the Potomac and Ohio Rivers was located at Atlanta.

The National Government in all of its endeavors connected with the section constituting this a reserve district, and extending even beyond it, has recognized Atlanta as the place to which convenience attaches for conducting business through this section by locating at Atlanta the headquarters of its activities for the section.

To repeat, Atlanta is the headquarters for the Government Railway Mail Service. It is the military headquarters, the headquarters for the new division of the Bureau of Commerce, and at it is located the Federal prison. Four different departments of the Government, at different periods, investigating the question of convenience, selected Atlanta as the place from which conveniently to transact business throughout this entire section.

The reserve bank should be located not only for the present but with reference to the future. The facts already stated fix Atlanta as the place where future growth may be expected. As an evidence of how this growth has proceeded, in 1912 the new buildings in Atlanta cost over $9,000,000, while those of New Orleans amounted to less than $4,000,000.

Not only does the action of the Government heretofore which has been mentioned furnish testimony that Atlanta has the advantage in point of convenience, but the voluntary and independent selection of Atlanta for southern headquarters by the insurance companies, by the various manufacturing companies, and by the commercial houses, the separate judgment of the men controlling all these various activities, fixes Atlanta as the point of advantage for convenience of business throughout the territory covered by the reserve bank. All these lines of business have been located in Atlanta, and their superintendents and managers being now engaged in conducting their business from Atlanta throughout this section, the customary course of business for the section is fixed at Atlanta.

POSTAL RECEIPTS.

Perhaps nothing shows clearer the ordinary course of business than the postal receipts of a city. The postal receipts of Atlanta for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, were $1,328,193, while those of New Orleans for the same period were $1,182,285.

OTHER STATES AND CITIES FOR ATLANTA.

A large part of Florida, including 8 of 12 banks in Jacksonville, favored Atlanta. The governor and his cabinet indorsed Atlanta. Savannah asked for Atlanta after Savannah. Practically all of the other banks of Georgia asked for Atlanta. The Knoxville (Tenn.) Board of Commerce indorsed Atlanta as first choice. Chattanooga, after herself, asked for Atlanta. Montgomery, after herself, asked for Atlanta. Mobile, after New Orleans, asked for Atlanta. The president of the Mississippi Bankers' Association gave his first evidence for New Orleans, but second for Atlanta.

TESTIMONY BEFORE ORGANIZATION COMMITTEE.

In their hearings throughout the United States the opinion of men supposed to be best informed was asked by the organization committee as to what cities should be selected for the location of reserve banks. New York, Chicago, San Francisco, and St. Louis were indicated by more of these witnesses than any other cities, but Atlanta received more indorsements than any city except these four. The best thought, therefore, of the entire country, indicated the necessity for a reserve district with the reserve bank located at Atlanta.

IN CONCLUSION.

Georgia will contribute one-third of the capital to the reserve bank. Atlanta will contribute more to the capital of the reserve bank than New Orleans or any other city in the district. It would have been unjust under all these facts to have located the reserve bank at any other point.

Before the reading had been concluded,

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the city from which I hail is a disappointed candidate for one of these reserve banks, and in order to voice this disappointment I ask that the further reading of the document be suspended and that we proceed with the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent was given for the reading.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am perfectly willing that the balance of it, which is just one page, may go into the RECORD without reading.

Mr. THOMAS. I made my request with the consent of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SWANSON. I have here a statement of 8 or 10 lines in regard to Richmond——

Mr. THOMAS. I insist on the regular order.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to say that the Senator from Virginia will be given an opportunity to put in the RECORD the little document he has. I do not want anything to be said about New Orleans without giving Richmond a chance to be heard. I hope the Senator from Colorado will withdraw his objection.

Mr. THOMAS. This is no place for a controversy of this sort, and I insist on the regular order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I insist with the Senator.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to request that this memorandum be put in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I object unless I can have a similar memorandum in regard to Dallas printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object to both requests. A moment ago I did not object to the request of the Senator from Georgia because before I came into the Chamber the Senator from Louisiana had obtained the reading of something which he had, and I thought it but fair, as that was mainly an attack upon a city in Georgia, that the Senator from Georgia should have an equal footing.

Mr. RANSDELL. There was so much confusion in the Chamber that I could not hear what my friend from Mississippi said.

Mr. SWANSON. I withdraw my request. I shall read the memorandum some time to-day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is better.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no further petitions or memorials, reports of committees are in order.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT MONROE, N. C.

Mr. SWANSON. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 12169) providing for an additional appropriation for a public building in the city of Monroe, N. C., and I submit a report (No. 410) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] to the report.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. It is an emergency measure. It is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury and has passed the House of Representatives. It is necessary, the Secretary of the Treasury says, to have this money in order to complete the building, which is now nearing completion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $3,000 for the completion of a post-office building now under construction in the city of Monroe, N. C., this same being necessary to carry out the original design for the building.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, yesterday there was reported from the Committee on Woman Suffrage Senate joint resolution No. 130. It is in identical language with Senate joint resolution No. 1. I raise the point of order that it is not competent to report a second resolution on the same subject, the former resolution having been defeated, and that Senate joint resolution No. 130 should be stricken from the calendar.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. I wish to inquire whether the point of order which the Senator from Florida has now raised and which he wishes to discuss is in order under this order of business?

Mr. BRYAN. It is, under reports of committees.

Mr. THOMAS. It is a point of order on the report of a committee made yesterday.

Mr. BRYAN. Suppose it is; I make the point of order that the calendar has no right to contain Senate joint resolution No. 130 as Order of Business 348.

Mr. THOMAS. I insist on my point of order, and ask for a ruling upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the impression that under the reports of committees the question might as well be met now as at any time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will inquire what the question really is? There was so much disturbance in the Chamber I did not hear it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order raised by the Senator from Florida is that the joint resolution reported from the Committee on Woman Suffrage, being identical in language with the joint resolution which heretofore failed to pass at the present session of the Congress of the United States, it has no right to be upon the calendar and should be stricken therefrom.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is on the calendar, is it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was reported yesterday and placed on the calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that point of order will not lie.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the impression that at present the point of order is not well taken, but that the point of order may be raised whenever it is attempted to present the resolution to the Senate for consideration.

Mr. BRYAN. Very well, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That will be the ruling of the Chair. The introduction of bills and joint resolutions is in order.

M'CLINTIC-MARSHALL CONSTRUCTION CO.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Before leaving the order of reports of committees, I am directed by the Committee on Claims to report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 5147) to authorize and direct Col. George W. Goethals, Governor of the Canal Zone, and formerly chairman and chief engineer of the Isthmian Canal Commission, to investigate certain claims of the McClintic-Marshall Construction Co., and making an appropriation for the payment thereof, and I submit a report (No. 411) thereon.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator whether it will lead to any discussion?

Mr. OLIVER. If it leads to discussion further than a brief explanation on my part of the provisions of the bill, I will withdraw the request. If it leads to any discussion at all, I will withdraw it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments of the Committee on Claims were, on page 1, line 9, after the words "what amount," to insert the words "if any"; on page 2, line 24, after the words "He shall report," to insert the words "in detail"; in the same line, to strike out the word "Treasurer" and insert the word "Congress"; and on page 3, line 2, after the words "McClintic-Marshall Construction Co.," to strike out the remainder of the bill, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That Col. George W. Goethals, Governor of the Canal Zone, and formerly chairman and chief engineer of the Isthmian Canal Commission, is hereby authorized and directed to investigate the claims of the McClintic-Marshall Construction Co., a corporation of the State of Pennsylvania, having its principal office in the city of Pittsburgh, in said State, and to ascertain what amount, if any, is in justice, equity, and fairness due and owing to the said McClintic-Marshall Construction Co. from the Isthmian Canal Commission for work and labor done and materials furnished in connection with the construction and erection of lock gates and appurtenances for the Panama Canal, and in connection with or incidental to the doing of the work and furnishing of the materials provided for in a certain contract between the Isthmian Canal Commission and said McClintic-Marshall Construction Co., dated June 21, 1910, including the extra expense and cost resulting from the work being of an unprecedented nature and performed under conditions not known to either party at the time of the making of the contract and specifications, which caused delays and compelled the work to be done by the contractor under requirements as to character and finish not fairly within the meaning of the specifications, and under necessity for rapid completion without allowance of adequate additional time.

The said Col. George W. Goethals, Governor of the Canal Zone, is further authorized and empowered, either personally or through such commission as he may appoint, to investigate such claims and the various items thereof in such manner as to him may seem best, and to adjudicate the same, and either personally or through such commission is hereby empowered to administer oaths and affirmations to witnesses, and to issue subpœnas and to compel the attendance of witnesses. He shall report in detail to the Congress of the United States his finding as to the amount, if any, due under the provisions of this act to the said McClintic-Marshall Construction Co.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Pennsylvania as to why this special tribunal should be constituted for the purpose of hearing this one particular case, and why the ordinary courts are not open to the claimants for the prosecution of any just claim they have against the Government?

Mr. OLIVER. I will state to the Senator that this is an extraordinary case, and in this connection I will read the testimony given by Col. Goethals before the Committee on Appropriations. It will not take more than two or three minutes. Col. Goethals said:

By the specifications the bidder was required to state the time within which he would deliver the material for the several gates and the time within which those gates were to be completed. It is not possible for me to enter into discussion of this claim made by the contractors, because I have not the data here; but if Senator OLIVER proposes an amendment which will authorize an audit before any payment is made, if one be authorized, I do not think it is necessary for me to take up those matters.

The contract provided for the completion of the gates on the 1st of June, 1913. It subsequently developed that the contractors would not be able to complete within that time, and the question of an extension was taken up, with a modification of the contract relative to the penalties that would be imposed for noncompletion. I then learned that it was the fault of the commission's inspectors that the time limit for delivery could not be complied with. How far that extended or to what amount of additional expense the contractors were forced I am not prepared to state. I do know, however, that the contractors, notwithstanding the fact that everybody on the Isthmus knew they must be losing money, spared no expense, spared no material, nor spared any man to exert their utmost to the completion of those gates.

I also know that the completed gates are far superior to anything that I had ever anticipated or have ever seen in the way of lock-gate construction. Ordinarily, in viewing the lock when the gates are closed, you will see water bubbling up around the miter sill and between the leaves, but they have been obliged to grind those bonding surfaces of the gates so closely that there is absolutely no leakage passing either around the sills or between the metal surfaces of the gates.

My sympathies have been with the contractors, and if I could help them out under the contract I would gladly do it.

Now, that is my position, and has been all along.

It has been the best carried on contract. There has never been a whimper about the inspection, and anything that we have asked them to do they have gone ahead and done.

Col. Goethals goes on further and elaborates the matter.

The reason why this can not be referred to an ordinary tribunal is that there is an element of equity in it that the Court of Claims could not consider. Col. Goethals's testimony is to the effect that these men realized with him the necessity of united action in getting through this work in order that the canal might be opened; and he has said that, in his opinion, if the work had been in any other hands under like circumstances, the canal could not have been opened on time.

The bill simply provides for a careful and thorough audit and report in detail to Congress of the circumstances, leaving Congress, after it receives the report, to do what is considered to be best.

Mr. CRAWFORD. There is no appropriation made?

Mr. OLIVER. There is no appropriation made.

Mr. WALSH. I had a different impression from the reading of the bill. I understand now that if the claimants presented their claim to an ordinary tribunal that tribunal would be obliged to dismiss their claim under their contract.

Mr, OLIVER. Yes; that is, the tribunal could not allow what is justly and fairly owing to them.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly. They are insisting, however, that in view of the conditions under which the work was done, and in view of the exactions made of them by the Government in connection with the work, they are entitled to receive something beyond what would be accorded them by an ordinary court of law.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Senator kindly tell us how much they claim?

Mr. OLIVER. Their total loss is about $2,300,000, and the bill as originally introduced by me contained an appropriation of that amount, or so much thereof as might be necessary, to cover the findings; but the committee thought it best to strike out that part of the bill, and I am inclined to agree with them.

Mr. WALSH. It contemplates the payment of a possible claim to the extent of $2,000,000 over and above what this company would be entitled to recover in an ordinary court of law?

Mr. OLIVER. It is conceded that they would be entitled to recover something.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If the Senator from Montana will permit me just a second, I will say to him that the bill simply provides for an investigation and report to Congress. It does not finally conclude anything. If Congress is not satisfied with the finding, it need not appropriate the money; but the matter can be much more thoroughly investigated by Col. Goethals on the ground than it can be investigated by any court that we can organize here or by the Court of Claims.

Mr. WALSH. I understood that the bill carried an appropriation.

Mr. OLIVER. Not at all.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It appropriates nothing whatever.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize and direct Col. George W. Goethals, Governor of the Canal Zone, and formerly chairman and chief engineer of the Isthmian Canal Commission, to investigate certain claims of the McClintic-Marshall Construction Co."

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CLAPP:

A bill (S. 5180) to authorize the Postmaster General of the United States to establish employment exchanges at all presidential post offices (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 5181) for the relief of settlers on Northern Pacific Railroad lands, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. 5182) granting a pension to Michael Maloney; and

A bill (S. 5183) granting an increase of pension to T. D. Swain; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LANE:

A bill (S. 5184) granting an increase of pension to Eli Creekpaum (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHERMAN:

A bill (S. 5185) granting an increase of pension to Joseph M. Lansden; to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 5186) granting an increase of pension to Samuel Gibbs (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 5187) granting an increase of pension to Salem Gillispie (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 5188) granting an increase of pension to William H. Dickinson (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 5189) granting an increase of pension to William Hurt (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 5190) granting an increase of pension to Joseph M. Conway (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

HUAI CONSERVATION WORK IN CHINA.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I introduce and ask to have read the joint resolution which I send to the desk, and I call the attention of the Senate to it, because I am going to ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Oregon.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 139) to authorize the President to grant leave of absence to an officer of the Corps of Engineers, for the purpose of accepting an appointment under the Government of China on works of conservation and public improvement, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas the Republic of China, with the advice and assistance of the American Red Cross, has arranged for extensive reclamation work in China for the prevention of floods and the resultant famines, and is desirous that an Engineer officer of the United States Army, experienced in this class of work, be permitted to serve in preparing the project and in the execution of the work; and

Whereas the United States of America wishes to show its friendly feeling for the Republic of China by complying with this desire: Now therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to grant leave of absence to an officer of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, to assist the Republic of China, as a member of a board of officers to be designated by the Republic of China to make an examination and report on the reclamation of Huai River, and thereafter to act as chief engineer of the Huai conservation work in China, to be appointed by the same authority, in pursuance of an arrangement between the American Red Cross and the Government of China; and that such officer while absent on such leave be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept from the Government of China the said employment with compensation from said Government: Provided, however, That the permission so given shall be held to terminate at such date as the President may determine. To insure the continuance and completion of this work the President may have the power of substitution in case of the termination of the detail of said officer for any cause; and that the officer, while so absent in the service of the Republic of China, shall receive no pay or allowances from the United States Government.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. ROBINSON. For the present, I object.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Permit me——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, for 30 minutes I have been trying to get the floor to submit an amendment, and I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that he withhold his request for unanimous consent until the Senate has had an opportunity to conclude the regular order of business.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am perfectly willing to do that, Mr. President. I do not desire to preclude any Senator from presenting morning business.

(Some routine business was transacted, which appears under appropriate heading.)

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In connection with the joint resolution, I ask to have printed by way of explanation and for reference hereafter a letter from the Secretary of War addressed to me, approving the joint resolution, and also a statement by Miss Mabel T. Boardman, president of the Red Cross Society, of the conditions which induced the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The papers referred to are as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 4, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Referring to the proposed joint resolution authorizing the President, in his discretion, to grant leave of absence to an officer of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, to assist the Republic of China, as a member of a board of officers to be designated by the Republic of China to make an examination and report on the reclamation of Huai River, and thereafter to act as chief engineer of the Huai conservation work in China, to be appointed by the same authority, I beg to say that this joint resolution has been carefully considered by the Judge Advocate General and it fully meets with my approval. I believe the granting of the leave of absence to an officer of the Corps of Engineers for this purpose will not only do a great and valuable work for China, but will be a testimonial of our friendly feeling for that country and a desire to be of assistance to her in this great humanitarian work.

Sincerely, yours, LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War.

[From the New York Times, February 8, 1914.]

CHINA'S FLOODS MAY BE PREVENTED AND MILLIONS SAVED BY RED CROSS PLAN.

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

The public is manifesting so deep an interest in an important humanitarian work the American Red Cross has initiated in China that a brief explanation may be timely. The charter of the American Red Cross requires not only that it should mitigate the suffering caused by famine and other great calamities, but imposes upon it the duty "to devise and carry on measures for preventing the same." During the last six years the American Red Cross has expended hundreds of thousands of dollars for famine relief in China, and this does not include large cargoes of food, their transportation, nor the contributions furnished through missionary and other organizations.

In those portions of Anhui and Kiangsu, which lie north of the Huai River, the Hungtze Lake and the old bed of the Yellow River, south of the Province of Shantung, and the present bed of the Yellow River, and extending east and west from the sea to the Ke River, is a section of country which has known but little rest from floods and subsequent famine for the last 2,500 years. This section is a portion of China's great alluvial plain.

We have the history of this section—physical, geographical, and human—for the last 25 centuries at least, and, in addition, the records of the various cities and districts give the years of flood and famine and the amount and kind of relief given to the sufferers; taxes remitted year after year, millions of ounces of silver and tons of free grain. The floods have so increased in frequency and the resulting famines in acuteness that now, over the whole area under consideration, the farmers do not average more than two crops in five years, where, if the floods were eliminated, the normal condition would be two large crops each year, and this loss is an ever-increasing one.

In 1911 the officers of the American Red Cross, with the approval of the State Department, decided to offer to the Chinese Government an expert engineer on river conservancy to make a thorough examination of this flood and famine region, with a view to designing some scheme by means of which the flood level could be lowered, the rivers properly trained, and the swamps and shallow lakes drained and made available for agriculture. For this purpose a small balance of the famine relief fund then in hand was utilized. This offer was accepted with gratitude by the Chinese Government, which proposed to furnish all necessary assistance and provide for all field expenses on its part, the American Red Cross paying the engineer's salary.

Charles Davis Jameson, a civil engineer of standing, who had spent 16 years in China, was selected for this work. The disturbed conditions that arose shortly after his arrival interrupted and delayed his work. At the end of 1912, however, Mr. Jameson submitted a report to the Chinese Government and to the American Red Cross.

The late administration, under President Taft, and the present administration under President Wilson, instructed the American representative at Peking to inform the Government of China that this effort toward river conservancy in central China and the resulting prevention of floods and famines in that area has the most earnest approval of the United States Government, and in a long dispatch, dated January 13, to the State Department, Dr. Reinsch, the American minister at Peking, reported:

"There can not be any doubt of the vast importance of the execution of this work from the point of view of humanity, as the welfare of the millions of human beings who inhabit the northern part of Kiangsu and Anhui is entirely dependent upon this improvement. Vast floods, with their heartrending consequences of famine, involving death and suffering of millions will continue until this work is carried out. On the soundness of this enterprise as a business undertaking, the report of Mr. Jameson, made to the Red Cross August 29, 1912, gives sufficient indication. The lands recovered, together with the benefit of the taxes to be imposed upon lands relieved of periodic floods, would afford an ample security for the loans."

The American minister at Peking cabled on January 23 to the Secretary of State that the Chinese Government was ready to grant to the American Red Cross exclusive authority to make arrangements for the Huai River conservancy work, this authority to be effective for one year, the amount of the loan to be $20,000,000 and an additional sum later if needed to complete the work. The Chinese Government guaranteed the loan and gave in addition as security the taxes and revenues from the lands benefited in the conservancy area.

A request was also made that the American Red Cross recommend an engineer—preferably an Army engineer—of at least five years' experience in the United States on river conservancy of the first magnitude for the post of chief engineer, to be appointed by the Chinese Government.

At a joint meeting of the executive committee and the international relief board of the American Red Cross—at which were present the following members of the committee and board: Gen. George W. Davis, chairman; Senator Root, Secretary Lane, Prof. John Bassett Moore, Hon. Henry D. Flood, chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs; Mr. Seth Low, Mr. John Barrett, Mr. James Tanner, Surg. Gen. Stokes, Mr. B. N. Baker, Mr. Franklin Roosevelt, Assistant Secretary of the Navy; Miss Boardman, and Mr. Bicknell—the matter was thoroughly discussed, and the Department of State was requested to cable to the American minister at Peking, regarding the proposition of the Chinese Government, that the Red Cross is a humanitarian and philanthropic organization, and under the terms of its charter can not extend its functions to commercial or business enterprises; but that it was prepared to name an engineering corporation of the highest character and responsibility to take up at once with the Chinese Government the terms and conditions upon which such corporation would provide funds for the conservancy work. The Red Cross requested that the Chinese Government would appoint a commissioner, fully empowered to frame and sign a proper contract for the work.

The American Red Cross agreed, in case the Government of China makes the necessary contract, further to use its good offices to secure a competent and experienced engineer, preferably an Army engineer, who shall be approved by the Chinese Government and the contractor for appointment by the Chinese Government as engineer in chief, to the end that the conservancy work may be carried on under the supervision of such an engineer, Mr. C. D. Jameson, as general adviser, and under general plans which are to be determined by a board of engineers to be comprised of the chief engineer, the general adviser, and three other engineers, one of whom shall be nominated by the contractor and two to be recommended by the Red Cross for appointment by the Government of China. The J. G. White Engineering Corporation was selected, after a consultation with its officers, as a reliable firm that had done much work for the United States Government, both in this country and in the Philippines. The Chinese Government has accepted the proposition and named as negotiator Dr. Chen Chin Tao, who is already on his way to this country.

The American Red Cross in this matter is acting as a friend for China and is carrying out its duty for the prevention of the famines which cause such terrible suffering. The opportunity is given to America to aid China in this great humanitarian undertaking and to do an honest and efficient piece of work without injury to the integrity of that country.

MABEL T. BOARDMAN.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 6, 1914.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. ROBINSON submitted an amendment relative to the employment of agents and supervisors in the Indian Service without reference to the civil-service laws, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALSH (for Mr. MYERS) submitted an amendment providing that sums for salaries of clerks in the offices of surveyors general may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be used interchangeably as the condition of the office work upon returns of public-land surveys requires, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SMOOT submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $25,000 for the continuation of the appropriation for the establishment of a fish-cultural station in the State of Utah, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANSDELL submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for experiments and demonstrations in live-stock production in the cane sugar and cotton districts of the United States from $50,000 to $100,000, intended to be proposed by him to the agricultural appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRAWFORD submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $5,000 for the maintenance of an assay office at Deadwood, S. Dak., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

EDWARD L. KEYES.

Mr. THOMAS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 5087) for the relief of Edward L. Keyes, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

COMMISSION OF FINE ARTS.

Mr. ROOT submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 333), which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed 2,000 copies of Senate Document No. 192, Sixty-second Congress—Message from the President of the United States, transmitting the Report of the Commission of Fine Arts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911; and 2,000 copies of Senate Document No. 960, Sixty-second Congress—Message from the President of the United States, transmitting the Report of the Commission of Fine Arts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, for the use of the Senate document room.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON INTEROCEANIC CANALS.

Mr. O'GORMAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 334), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to employ a stenographer at a cost not to exceed $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject that may be pending before or referred to said committee, and to have such hearings printed for the use of the committee; that the expenses of such hearings be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

LOCATION OF FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I submit a resolution, which I send to the desk and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 332) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the organization committee of the Federal Reserve Board be, and it is hereby, directed to send to the Senate copies of all briefs and written arguments made by each city applying to the organization committee for the location of a Federal reserve bank, together with the reasons relied upon by the organization committee in fixing the boundaries of the reserve districts and locating the reserve cities.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SWANSON. I think the resolution had better go over for to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being objection, the resolution goes over until to-morrow. Morning business is closed.

RADIUM-BEARING ORES.

Mr. WALSH. I move that the bill (S. 4405) to provide for and encourage the prospecting, mining, and treatment of radium-bearing ores in lands belonging to the United States, for the purpose of securing an adequate supply of radium for Government and other hospitals in the United States, and for other purposes, be made a special order for Friday afternoon next at 2 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What is the motion of the Senator from Montana? It was impossible to hear the Senator on this side of the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the motion.

The SECRETARY. Mr. WALSH moves that Senate bill 4405, known as the radium bill, be made the special order for Friday next at 2 o'clock p. m.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] is out of the Chamber. I call the attention of the Senator from Montana to the fact that the unfinished business comes up at 2 o'clock, and of course the unfinished business would take precedence of the special order.

Mr. WALSH. I recognize that.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will make his motion for 1 o'clock, I hardly think there would be objection on the part of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. WALSH. That would be quite agreeable to me.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator, then, will amend the motion so as to fix the hour at 1 o'clock?

Mr. WALSH. I shall be very glad to amend the motion in that way.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not desire to interfere with any arrangement of that sort, but I gave notice some days ago that I would ask permission of the Senate to address the Senate to-morrow on the Panama Canal tolls question. I am very anxious to make that speech immediately on the close of the routine morning business and to conclude it. It will only take about an hour, and I hope the Senator from Montana will not prevent me carrying out that intention.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I am very sure I shall be very glad at that time to yield to him if he desires to address the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] that the bill referred to by him be made the special order for 1 o'clock on Friday next.

The motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF INAUGURAL DATE, ETC.

Mr. WORKS obtained the floor.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I merely wish to make a motion similar to that of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I move that Senate joint resolution No. 10 be made a special order for the 20th day of April, at 2 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on that motion.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the Senator from Colorado advise the Senate what the joint resolution is.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is Senate joint resolution No. 10, proposing to amend the Constitution by providing that the terms of President and Vice President shall commence on the second Monday in January following the election of presidential and vice presidential electors, and that Congress shall meet on the first Monday in January succeeding the election and on the first Monday of January of the next year. It dispenses with the short session, which is limited by virtue of the Constitution to expire on the 4th day of March.

Mr. BORAH. When did we ever have a short session of Congress for the last 10 years?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. We have not had any short sessions——

Mr. SHAFROTH. We have had short sessions, for every alternate session expires by constitutional limitation on the 4th of March. During the short sessions there are crowded before the Senate more bills than can be carefully considered, and the result is turmoil.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I yielded to the Senator from Colorado, supposing he desired to propose something which would not take any time. It is quite evident, however, that his request will involve discussion, and I think I shall decline to yield further.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the motion of the Senator from Colorado will involve discussion.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator from Utah does not mean that the motion which I have just made will involve discussion?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; the motion which the Senator has just made will involve discussion.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am willing to fix any time which may be suggested, say the 27th of April.

Mr. WORKS. I decline to yield further, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California refuses to yield, and the Senator from California has the floor.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia has stated that he desired to occupy 5 or 10 minutes. If he shall consume no more time than that, I shall be glad to accommodate him.

Mr. SWANSON. I shall not exceed 10 minutes.

Mr. WORKS. I hope the Senator will take no more time than that, and if greater delay than that is involved I shall have to decline to yield.

Mr. RANSDELL. I should like to ask, if the Senator from California is going to yield to the Senator from Virginia, if he will let me read in his time the report——

Mr. SWANSON. I decline to yield.

Mr. WORKS. I shall have to decline to yield.

Mr. SWANSON. I think it ungenerous of the Senator from Louisiana not to permit me to proceed when I yielded to him this morning.

Mr. RANSDELL. I asked unanimous consent this morning that the Senator be given an opportunity to read the document he desires incorporated in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] has the floor.

TREATY RELATIONS WITH GREAT BRITAIN AND PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, when I suspended my remarks yesterday afternoon I was reading from the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, known as the Davis report.

I desire to finish the reading of the particular clause that was then under discussion. The report says further:

The President hopes that by the consent of all maritime powers all such difficulties may be prevented, and the interoceanic lines, with the harbors of immediate approach to them, may be secured beyond interruption to the great purposes for which they were established.

Thus the United States in the beginning, before the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, took the same ground that is reached in the convention of February, 1900, for the universal decree of the neutral, free, and innocent use of the canal as a world's highway, where war should not exist and where the honor of all nations would be a safer protection than fortresses for its security. From that day to this these wise forecasts have been fulfilled and Europe has adopted, in the convention of Constantinople, the same great safeguard for the canal that was projected by Mr. Cass in 1857.

The only objections that have been urged by the United States have not related to the treaty as a binding compact, but to the conduct of Great Britain in executing its terms and in refusing to abandon certain islands and coast possessions which she claimed were not held after the date of the treaty in violation of its terms.

Mr. President, without taking up the time of the Senate with reading further from this report, I desire to include in my remarks some extracts from it which to a certain extent illuminate the question that is now before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission to do so is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

It was for the purpose of settling the only disputed questions that had arisen out of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that Sir William Gore Ousley was sent by Lord Napier to adjust the territorial rights of Great Britain with Nicaragua, Honduras, and Guatemala, these being the only States whose territorial rights were in dispute.

The treaties were made and ratified, and, with some amendments, to which we have made no objections, they are still in force as permanent settlements of all the questions raised as to boundaries and jurisdictions. The treaty with Nicaragua was intended to remove the Mosquito Indians from the coast that included Greytown and the mouths of the San Juan River, and to leave Nicaragua free from the alleged sovereign rights of those people, and it absolved her from all claim of Great Britain to control that region, in virtue of her protectorate over them or otherwise.

This is a permanent result that freed the canal line from all embarrassment of any jurisdictional right or power of Great Britain over it. It is a contract with Nicaragua which cleared off all British incumbrance from her territory along the San Juan River and left Nicaragua free to deal with the United States respecting her own undisputed territory.

If the Clayton-Bulwer treaty had been abrogated since the date of her treaty with Nicaragua, it would not have entitled Great Britain to claim the restoration of the statu quo and the resumption of her alleged rights as suzerain over the Mosquito Indians, which was reliquished to Nicaragua by a later treaty. Nicaragua was not a party to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but, as between the United States and Great Britain, its revocation or abrogation would have canceled the prohibition in article 1 against the right of Great Britain to treat with Nicaragua for the exclusive control of an interoceanic canal through her territory.

By her treaty of 1860 with Nicaragua, which was provided for in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, Great Britain obtained the same rights and assumed the same obligations that we acquired seven years later, in 1867, by our treaty with Nicaragua.

These rights and duties, while they are very extensive and quite sufficient to establish through their exercise a control of the canal that would become supreme in the hands of a great power, are not "exclusive."

This magic word has paralyzed the eager desire of the two great powers to control this canal for 50 years, and now its disappearance leaves us free to construct and control the canal, excluding any right of Great Britain to interfere.

* * * * * * *

Thus it is manifest that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was regarded by our Government as the peaceful solution of a very grave situation in 1850 that we were not prepared to accept as a casus belli, having just emerged from a great and expensive war with Mexico.

It was then felt by the American people that the attitude of Great Britain in her Central American policy was distinctly aggressive toward the United States, and was unjust, overbearing, and dangerous to the future of our country, and much of that sentiment still strongly affects our people. But they cheerfully accepted the treaty of April, 1850.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty certainly avoided hostile collision between these two great powers, whatever may have been its faults as an entangling alliance, or national humiliation to us, or as the cause of protracted and heated diplomatic controversy. It destroyed the Heis-Selva treaty with Nicaragua in 1849, under which the canal would have been built 40 years ago, and the Frelinghuysen-Zavalla treaty of 1884, under which the canal would now be in complete operation, yet we have not sought to abrogate it, although Mr. Blaine and Mr. Frelinghuysen, while Secretary of State, both proposed to modify it in certain important particulars.

Since 1860 the Clayton-Bulwer treaty has been in some way recognized by the Government in each of the succeeding administrations as a subsisting compact.

Strong reasons for its abrogation have been frequently stated, and some have always denied the obligatory force, but no movement to accomplish that result has been made, either by Congress or the Executive.

* * * * * * *

This treaty is therefore open and existing as a binding and unexecuted compact with the express approval of the United States as to the question of our control over the canal and our right to build and fortify it. It is executed, and therefore unrepealable as to all other questions and matters covered by its provisions. A question of its abrogation, raised at this time, would only relate to the parts of the treaty that remain to be executed.

The abrogation of this part of the treaty would leave Great Britain in the possession of the rights she has acquired in her treaties with Guatemala and Honduras as to the territory of those States, and it would leave her in the enjoyment of her treaty rights, as to the canal, that are granted her by Nicaragua in the treaty of 28th of August, 1860.

These rights are identical with those acquired by the United States in the treaty with Nicaragua of June 1, 1867. Neither Government, therefore, can now dispute the rights granted to the other by Nicaragua under those treaties. These treaty rights, which are identical, are also valid under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, being in furtherance of it. That treaty contemplated the building, ownership, and control of the canal by chartered companies and not by governments.

The identical treaties of Great Britain and the United States with Nicaragua provide for the protection of the canal and the companies of construction by the Governments, with the use of military or civil instrumentalities, and they limit the profits of the concessionary companies to 15 per cent.

In other respects the governmental supervision for the protection of the concessionaires, whether British or American, is nearly supreme, and would soon become absolute in the dealings of either of these powers with the protection of their citizens or subjects holding concessions from Nicaragua.

As matters stand, it has all the time, since these identical treaties were concluded, been a race of diligence between American and British concessionaires as to which of them should gain the control of the canal. One company being installed would, necessarily, exclude any other.

The right to a footing in Nicaragua, thus acquired by Great Britain, is full of peril to this Republic, and could only be disposed of by further agreement, or by war, or by uniting the interests of both Governments in the joint ownership and control of the canal. Such an arrangement, while it is still desired by some, would be a fatal mistake that would soon involve the countries in war, or it would enlarge and solidify the scheme of alliance that is embodied in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty into a practical alliance, offensive and defensive, in the control of navigation and the commerce of the world. It is these later treaties that present the real ground of our present difficulty from which the convention of 1900 relieves us.

* * * * * * *

No other nation except the United States could have so great an interest in the exclusive right to own and control an isthmian canal, but in this matter, come what may, we are compelled to assert the superiority of our right, now for the first time conceded by Great Britain. It is wise and just therefore that the value of this concession to us should be estimated as a great consideration for anything we may yield, if we, indeed, yield anything, in acquiring the exclusive right to control the canal by a modification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

In the convention of February 5, 1900, Great Britain agrees that the restriction as to the exclusive control of the canal imposed by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty shall continue to bind her, while the United States is released from it.

This leaves us free to acquire from Costa Rica and Nicaragua the exclusive control of the canal for the Government or for our citizens under the protection of the United States, while it cuts off Great Britain from any such right.

The purpose of this convention is "to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of April 19, 1850, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the United States."

The "objections" that may arise under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty are—

"(1) That neither the one nor the other (Government) will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal.

"(2) That neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same, or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy or fortify or colonize or assume or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America.

"(3) Nor make any use of any protection which either affords or may afford, or any alliance which either has or may have, to or with any State or people for the purpose of erecting any such fortifications, or of occupying or fortifying or colonizing Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America, or of assuming or exerting dominion over the same.

"(4) Nor will the United States or Great Britain take advantage of any intimacy, or use any alliance, connection, or influence that either may possess with any State or Government through whose territory the said canal may pass for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one, any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be afforded on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other."

Of this series of restrictions there are few, if any, that are not or may not become "objections" to the enjoyment of "all the rights incident to the construction (of the canal), as well as to the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal." These grounds of objection to our exclusive control of the canal are all removed by this convention except those that relate to fortifications, which, being expressly restated, are retained in a new or modified form.

This sweeping modification of article 1 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as to all its restrictions upon the right of the United States, under its auspices, to construct the canal and to have and enjoy all the rights, such as ownership, incident to its construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for its management and regulation, leaves no ground, substantial or conjectural, on which Great Britain could hereafter contend for any of the restrictions contained in that article (not expressly excepted) as remaining in force against the United States.

She consents to remain under the prohibitions of that article and consents that the United States shall be released from them in her negotiations with Costa Rica and Nicaragua for such exclusive rights in or relating to the canal as they may concede to the United States.

If this convention is ratified, Great Britain could not negotiate with Costa Rica or Nicaragua or any other American State for any right to build, own, control, manage, regulate, or protect a canal to connect the oceans, while the United States is left free to enter upon and conclude such negotiations.

There is nothing, therefore, to the prejudice of the United States in the convention of 5th February, 1900.

No American statesman, speaking with official authority or responsibility, has ever intimated that the United States would attempt to control this canal for the exclusive benefit of our Government or people. They have all, with one accord, declared that the canal was to be neutral ground in time of war and always open on terms of impartial equity to the ships and commerce of the world.

Special treaties for the neutrality, impartiality, freedom, and innocent use of the two canals that are to be the eastern and western gateway of commerce between the great oceans are not in keeping with the magnitude and universality of the blessings they must confer upon mankind. The subject rather belongs to the domain of international law.

* * * * * * *

Whatever canal is built in the Isthmus of Darien will be ultimately made subject to the same law of freedom and neutrality as governs the Suez Canal, as a part of the laws of nations, and no single power will be able to resist its control.

The European powers gave to this subject the greatest consideration and reached conclusions that are not open to criticism as being unjust to any nation in the world. Turkey and Egypt, the imperial and the local sovereigns of the canal, and Great Britain, a controlling stockholder in the Maritime Canal Co., had special interests in the rules for regulating the use of the canal, and they united in the convention, which deprived them of exceptional privileges in its navigation, in peace and in war, for the sake of justice to all maritime nations and the peace and prosperity of the world.

* * * * * * *

The United States can not take an attitude of opposition to the principles of the great act of October 22, 1888, without discrediting the official declarations of our Government for 50 years on the neutrality of an isthmian canal and its equal use by all nations, without discrimination.

To set up the selfish motive of gain by establishing a monopoly of a highway that must derive its income from the patronage of all maritime countries would be unworthy of the United States if we owned the country through which the canal is to be built.

But the location of the canal belongs to other Governments, from whom we must obtain any right to construct a canal on their territory, and it is not unreasonable, if the question was new and was not involved in a subsisting treaty with Great Britain, that she should question the right of even Nicaragua and Costa Rica to grant to our ships of commerce and of war extraordinary privileges of transit through the canal.

It is not reasonable to suppose that Nicaragua and Costa Rica would grant to the United States the exclusive control of a canal through those States on terms less generous to the other maritime nations than those prescribed in the great act of October 22, 1888; or if we could compel them to give us such advantages over other nations, it would not be creditable to our country to accept them.

* * * * * * *

The Suez Canal makes no discrimination in its tolls in favor of its stockholders, and, taking its profits or the half of them as our basis of calculation, we will never find it necessary to differentiate our rates of toll in favor of our own people in order to secure a very great profit on the investment.

* * * * * * *

The British Government, by a dispatch dated January 3, 1883, to its representatives at Paris, Berlin, Vienna, Rome, and St. Petersburg, expressed an opinion that an agreement respecting the Suez Canal ought to be made to the following effect:

"1. That the canal should be free for the passage of all ships in any circumstances.

"2. That in time of war a limitation of time as to ships of war of a belligerent remaining in the canal should be fixed, and no troops or munitions of war should be disembarked in the canal.

"3. That no hostilities should take place in the canal or its approaches, or elsewhere in the territorial waters of Egypt, even in the event of Turkey being one of the belligerents.

"4. That neither of the two immediately foregoing conditions shall apply to measures which may be necessary for the defense of Egypt."

This was followed by the negotiations which resulted in the convention—referred to in article 2 of the pending treaty—between Great Britain and certain other powers, signed at Constantinople October 29, 1888.

A copy of that convention is annexed to this report.

The committee are in full accord with the purpose expressed in article 2 of the pending convention to adopt as the basis of neutralization the indicated rules substantially as embodied in the treaty of Constantinople for the free navigation of the Suez Maritime Canal.

Sections 1 to 7 of article 2 of the treaty now under consideration set out the rules of neutrality, prohibitions of hostilities, and rights of passage of war vessels of belligerents substantially the same with those expressed in the treaty of Constantinople. Articles 4, 5, and 7 of that convention provide, in substance, as follows:

"Article 4. The canal remaining open in time of war as a free passage even to the ships of war of belligerents according to the terms of article 1, the parties agree that no right of war, no act of hostility, nor any act having for its object to obstruct the free navigation of the canal shall be committed in the canal and its ports of access, as well as within a radius of 3 marine miles from those ports, even though the Ottoman Empire should be one of the belligerent parties. Vessels of war of belligerents shall not revictual or take in stores in the canal and its ports of access except in so far as may be strictly necessary. The transit of the aforesaid vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay. Their stay at Port Said and in the roadstead of Suez shall not exceed 24 hours, except in case of distress, and in such case they shall leave as soon as possible. An interval of 24 hours shall elapse between the departure of belligerent ships of the opposing nations."

Article 5 provides against the disembarking by a belligerent of troops, munitions, or material of war in the canal.

Article 6 provides that prizes shall be subject to the same rules as vessels of war of belligerents.

Article 7 provides that the powers shall not keep vessels of war in the canal.

The foregoing abstract is believed to express correctly those provisions of the treaty of Constantinople which have been substantially incorporated into the pending convention.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I have not read from this report for the purpose of strengthening my own argument so much as to set before the Senate what is claimed to be the foundation of the argument upon the other side of the question. I think the American people are entitled to know what the facts are; to know what has been said by the representatives of this Government and of Great Britain upon this question that is now agitating the people of the two countries. Whatever construction may be placed on the language used by Senator Davis in this report, we have the testimony of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and other Senators then in this body that he agreed with the contention I am now making, that under the treaty we have the right to exempt our coastwise ships from the payment of tolls.

I have read from the Davis report partly for the purpose of showing, as I think will be evident to all of the Senators, that there is absolutely nothing in the report to which I have referred that sustains or supports in the slightest degree the contention that is now made here that we were not entitled and were not understood to be entitled under the provisions of this treaty to exempt our own ships from the payment of tolls.

It must be remembered in this connection that the Davis report was not made upon the treaty which was finally ratified, but was made upon the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and that treaty was materially changed by amendments made in the Senate, which were afterwards adopted by the two Governments. Therefore, so far as its effect on this treaty is concerned, it has practically no force.

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE TAKING PLACE AFTER THE ENACTMENT OF THE STATUTE.

Mr. President, for the purpose of determining what construction was placed upon this treaty by the two Governments after the controversy actually arose following the enactment of the Panama Canal act, when the English Government protested against the enactment of that statute and the execution of it, I take up the correspondence following the passage of the act, and I undertake to say again, as I have already said, that the British Government has never claimed in any of the correspondence which has taken place that we have not the perfect right to exempt our own coastwise trade from the payment of tolls.

The utmost that has been claimed is that our ships while engaged in the coastwise trade may at the same time engage in the foreign trade; but that, as I said yesterday, does not involve the question of the construction of the statute or its validity, or the question as to whether or not it violates the treaty; it is a question of fact that may be determined by arbitration, if necessary, as to whether our own domestic ships are violating not only the treaty in its spirit and letter, but are also violating the statute which we have enacted. Therefore that claim can not be pressed as against our act in passing the statute, and can only be resorted to if it should turn out that we have by virtue of that statute violated the treaty by carrying foreign goods.

I quote, first, from a letter written by Chargé Innes to the Secretary of State, under date of July 8, 1912, in which he says:

It is true that there is nothing in that treaty to prevent the United States from subsidizing its shipping, and if it granted a subsidy His Majesty's Government could not be in a position to complain.

And for a very good reason, because the British Government has resorted to that means of building up its marine business, and there is no doubt that the English Government would subsidize its own ships by paying for its shipping interests the tolls that are charged by the United States for passing through the canal. Therefore it desires to keep the way open that will enable it to do just exactly what some people in this country are claiming now that we are attempting to do; to establish a subsidy in favor of our own ships.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PITTMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. WORKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Might I say in this connection that the practice of the British Government with respect to subsidizing its shipping is so general that in 1911 the total amount expended by Great Britain and her possessions in subsidizing their shipping aggregated $10,000,000?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in connection with what the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] has just been observing, it is a well-known fact that Great Britain to-day is paying practically the tolls on her ships that go through the Suez Canal, and beyond a question Great Britain will, from the treasury of the Empire, pay the tolls on her ships that pass through the Panama Canal; so that we will be handicapped in that respect and be at a tremendous disadvantage, so far as our own ships are concerned, in competing with a foreign government that has paid not a dollar for the construction of the canal and that has no financial interest in it.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the Senator from New Hampshire is correct, but I do not want to be misunderstood in respect of the effect of granting free passage to our ships. As between us and Great Britain, considering the manner in which rates have been fixed, it does amount to a subsidy; that is to say, our Government will lose the amount that is unpaid by our own ships. England, however, will suffer no loss whatever on that account. But as between our Government and our own shipping it is in no sense a subsidy, for the simple reason that we are putting our own ships that pass through the Panama Canal on an absolute equality with the ships that pass through other waterways which the Government has improved at a cost of millions of dollars. Therefore, so far as it affects ourselves, it is in no sense a subsidy, as I shall attempt to show further along. I am dealing now, however, with our relations with the Government of Great Britain; and as between the two nations Great Britain is admitting that we have a right to subsidize our own ships; and that is precisely what we are doing, as I shall attempt to show. Therefore that objection by Great Britain is of no force whatever.

He says, further:

But there is a great distinction between a general subsidy, either to shipping at large or to shipping engaged in any given trade, and a subsidy calculated particularly with reference to the amount of user of the canal by the subsidized lines or vessels. If such a subsidy were granted, it would not, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, be in accordance with the obligations of the treaty.

As to the proposal that exemption shall be given to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, a more difficult question arises. If the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic which is reserved for United States vessels would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken.

That brings us back again to the point I made a moment ago, that it is not a question of the validity of the statute or any act we have done in the past, but a question as to whether somebody may carry foreign trade in domestic ships. When that time shall come, then the question may properly arise as to whether the question should be submitted to arbitration.

Sir Edward Grey, in a letter to Ambassador Bryce of December 9, 1912, has this further to say:

A careful study of the President's memorandum has convinced me that he has not fully appreciated the British point of view and has misunderstood Mr. Mitchell Innes's note of the 8th of July. The President argues upon the assumption that it is the intention of His Majesty's Government to place upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty an interpretation which would prevent the United States from granting subsidies to their own shipping passing through the canal, and which would place them at a disadvantage as compared with other nations. This is not the case. His Majesty's Government regard equality of all nations as the fundamental principle underlying the treaty of 1901 in the same way that it was the basis of the Suez Canal convention of 1888, and they do not seek to deprive the United States of any liberty which is open either to themselves or to any other nation; nor do they find either in the letter or in the spirit of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty any surrender by either of the contracting powers of the right to encourage its shipping or its commerce by such subsidies as it may deem expedient.

* * * * * * * *

The purpose of the United States in negotiating the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was to recover their freedom of action and obtain the right, which they had surrendered, to construct the canal themselves. This is expressed in the preamble to the treaty, but the complete liberty of action consequential upon such construction was to be limited by the maintenance of the general principle embodied in article 8 of the earlier treaty.

I have endeavored to show, in what I have said already, that there is no principle set forth in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that has the slightest application to the situation as it exists to-day, or in any way affects the right of the United States to exempt its ships from the payment of tolls. On the contrary, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty itself, in express language, determines upon just what terms Great Britain and every other nation may have the use of the canal. There is no occasion for referring to any other treaty for any principle that can affect the question. As I showed yesterday, those principles have no application in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, because the conditions are entirely different.

That principle, as shown above, was one of equal treatment for both British and United States ships.

Remember that that provision in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was based upon the fact that the two parties to it had in fact gone into partnership for the purpose of having constructed the canal and protecting it for all future time. For that reason the principle of equality must necessarily apply, because they were operating upon an equal footing, and each of them was responsible equally with the other for the protection of the canal. The two Governments, under that treaty, were authorized to fix the rates that should be paid for vessels passing through the canal. That condition does not exist now under the present treaty. There is no ground upon which the British Government can claim that it shall be placed upon an equal footing with the United States, which has built this canal and has burdened itself with its operation and maintenance.

He says, further:

A study of the language of article 8 shows that the word "neutralization," in the preamble of the later treaty, is not there confined to belligerent operations, but refers to the system of equal rights for which article 8 provides.

There is no foundation for that claim; not the slightest. This is the first time the British Government has advanced any such claim. Throughout the correspondence that took place previous to the enactment of the statute it was discussed solely upon the question of neutrality, in the ordinary sense of the term. That the principle included anything else but neutrality in time of war was never intimated by the British Government until it undertook to use that principle for the purpose of securing in this canal some rights to which it was not entitled under the express provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

There is no foundation for it for another reason. There is no occasion for reference to that article for the establishment of any principle that is contained in it, for the simple reason that the principle of neutrality is expressly stated in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and it must be judged by the terms of that treaty and not otherwise. It provides specifically upon what terms and conditions the ships of other nations in time of peace and war shall pass through the canal. Why refer to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty when we have the whole doctrine laid down in the particular treaty that is under consideration, which determines specifically what the rights of the parties are?

He says further:

If the wording of the article is examined, it will be seen that there is no mention of belligerent action in it at all.

But when they discussed it before—and I read the correspondence to the Senate yesterday—it was discussed upon that basis and no other.

Joint protection and equal treatment are the only matters alluded to, and it is to one or both of these that neutralization must refer. Such joint protection has always been understood by His Majesty's Government to be one of the results of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of which the United States was most anxious to get rid, and they can scarcely, therefore believe that it was such joint protection that the United States were willing to keep alive, and to which they referred in the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It certainly was not the intention of His Majesty's Government that any responsibility for the protection of the canal should attach to them in the future. Neutralization must therefore refer to the system of equal rights.

But the subject of neutralization was considered in the treaty itself, and everything necessary to cover that situation was provided for in the treaty. The very fact that the British Government is relieved from all responsibility under the former treaty is a consideration for placing it upon just the same terms as all of the other nations and giving it no right that does not belong to every other nation in the world.

For these reasons His Majesty's Government maintain that the words "all nations" in rule 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty include the United States, and that in consequence British vessels using the canal are entitled to equal treatment with those of the United States, and that the same tolls are chargeable on each.

It must be remembered that the British Government has already admitted that this does not apply to our coastwise trade. Great Britain is not interested in the coastwise trade of the United States. She can not compete in it. She is forbidden by law to do so. There can be no discrimination as between our coastwise ships and the ships of the British nation; and therefore she has no interest in the question whether or not we relieve our ships from the payment of tolls, unless the effect of it is, as she claims, that it tends to increase the amount that she shall pay for her ships in passing through the canal. I am going to show that there is no foundation for that claim; that the way in which the rates are fixed that are to be charged to other ships shows that the exemption of our own ships has no effect at all upon the amount that is to be paid by the British Government for its shipping.

This rule also provides that the tolls should be "just and equitable." The purpose of these words was to limit the tolls to the amount representing the fair value of the services rendered, i. e., to the interest on the capital expended and the cost of the operation and maintenance of the canal.

Does anybody suppose now that we are going to be able to levy upon ships passing through the canal such rates as will pay us the interest upon the investment? That has never been contemplated by this Government. It has never been believed that we can levy rates high enough to repay us the interest upon the investment or even to maintain the canal, at least for many years to come; so we are not charging unreasonable rates to any of the ships on that basis.

Unless the whole volume of shipping which passes through the canal, and which all benefits equally by its services, is taken into account—

Now, mark the language: "Unless all of the shipping * * * is taken into account" in determining the rates that shall be charged to all, then it is claimed it will be unjust to Great Britain.

Unless the whole volume of shipping which passes through the canal, and which all benefits equally by its services, is taken into account, there are no means of determining whether the tolls chargeable upon a vessel represent that vessel's fair proportion of the current expenditure properly chargeable against the canal; that is to say, interest on the capital expended in construction and the cost of operation and maintenance. If any classes of vessels are exempted from tolls in such a way that no receipts from such ships are taken into account in the income of the canal, there is no guaranty that the vessels upon which tolls are being levied are not being made to bear more than their fair share of the upkeep. Apart altogether, therefore, from the provision in rule 1 about equality of treatment for all nations, the stipulation that the tolls shall be just and equitable, when rightly understood, entitles His Majesty's Government to demand, on behalf of British shipping, that all vessels passing through the canal, whatever their flag or their character, shall be taken into account in fixing the amount of the tolls.

* * * * * * *

The President, in his memorandum, argues that if there is no difference, as stated in Mr. Mitchell Innes's note of the 8th July, between charging tolls only to refund them and remitting tolls altogether, the effect is to prevent the United States from aiding its own commerce in the way that all other nations may freely do. This is not so. His Majesty's Government have no desire to place upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty an interpretation which would impose upon the United States any restriction from which other nations are free or reserve to such other nation any privilege which is denied to the United States. Equal treatment, as specified in the treaty, is all they claim.

His Majesty's Government do not question the right of the United States to grant subsidies to United States shipping generally or to any particular branches of that shipping, but it does not follow, therefore, that the United States may not be debarred by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty from granting a subsidy to certain shipping in a particular way, if the effect of the method chosen for granting such subsidy would be to impose upon British or other foreign shipping an unfair share of the burden of the upkeep of the canal or to create a discrimination in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise to prejudice rights secured to British shipping by this treaty.

* * * * * * *

It has been argued that as the coastwise trade of the United States is confined by law to United States vessels, the exemption of vessels engaged in it from the payment of tolls can not injure the interests of foreign nations. It is clear, however, that the interests of foreign nations will be seriously injured in two material respects.

In the first place, the exemption will result in the cost of the working of the canal being borne wholly by foreign-going vessels, and on such vessels, therefore, will fall the whole burden of raising the revenue necessary to cover the cost of working and maintaining the canal. The possibility, therefore, of fixing the toll on such vessels at a lower figure than $1.25 per ton, or of reducing the rate below that figure at some future time, will be considerably lessened by the exemption.

That is the whole claim of the British Government with respect to that provision in the treaty. Unless the release of our own ships from the payment of tolls shall have the effect of increasing the amount that Great Britain shall pay, then she admits she has no cause of complaint.

In the second place, the exemption will, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, be a violation of the equal treatment secured by the treaty, as it will put the "coastwise trade" in a preferential position as regards other shipping.

Now, no question is made of our right to exempt our coastwise shipping; but it is claimed, and they go no further than that, that it may give to our coastwise ships the opportunity of doing a foreign business, which would be in violation of the treaty.

Coastwise trade can not be circumscribed so completely that benefits conferred upon it will not affect vessels engaged in the foreign trade. To take an example, if cargo intended for a United States port beyond the canal, either from east or west, and shipped on board a foreign ship could be sent to its destination more cheaply, through the operation of the proposed exemption, by being landed at a United States port before reaching the canal, and then sent on as coastwise trade, shippers would benefit by adopting this course in preference to sending the goods direct to their destination through the canal on board the foreign ship.

Again, although certain privileges are granted to vessels engaged in an exclusively coastwise trade, His Majesty's Government are given to understand that there is nothing in the laws of the United States which prevents any United States ship from combining foreign commerce with coastwise trade, and consequently from entering into direct competition with foreign vessels while remaining "prima facie" entitled to the privilege of free passage through the canal. Moreover, any restriction which may be deemed to be now applicable might at any time be removed by legislation, or even perhaps by mere changes in the regulations.

That is merely speculation as to what may happen in the future. It has no effect upon the validity of the statute, as I have insisted.

Again:

In these and in other ways foreign shipping would be seriously handicapped, and any adverse result would fall more severely on British shipping than on that of any other nationality.

Now, let us see what Secretary Knox says in reply to these contentions of the British Government. I submit that he answers them completely and conclusively, and leaves no ground upon which the Government of Great Britain has a right to complain.

Secretary of State Knox in a letter to Chargé d'Affaires Laughlin, January 17, 1913, says:

Regarding the first objection, the question presented by Sir Edward Grey arises solely upon the exemption in the canal act of vessels engaged in our coastwise trade.

On this point Sir Edward Grey says that "His Majesty's Government do not question the right of the United States to grant subsidies to United States shipping generally or to any particular branches of that shipping," and it is admitted in his note that the exemption of certain classes of ships would be "a form of subsidy" to those vessels; but it appears from the note that His Majesty's Government would regard that form of subsidy as objectionable under the treaty if the effect of such subsidy would be "to impose upon British or other foreign shipping an unfair share of the burden of the upkeep of the canal, or to create a discrimination in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise to prejudice rights secured to British shipping by this treaty."

* * * * * * *

This objection must be read in connection with the views expressed by the British Government while this act was pending in Congress, which were stated in the note of July 8, 1912, on the subject from Mr. Innes as follows:

"As to the proposal that exemption shall be given to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, a more difficult question arises. If the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic which is reserved for United States vessels would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken."

This statement may fairly be taken as an admission that this Government may exempt its vessels engaged in the coastwise trade from the payment of tolls, provided such exemption be restricted to bona fide coastwise traffic. As to this it is sufficient to say that obviously the United States is not to be denied the power to remit tolls to its own coastwise trade because of a suspicion or possibility that the regulations yet to be framed may not restrict this exemption to bona fide coastwise traffic.

* * * * * * *

On this same point Sir Edward Grey urges another objection to the exemption of coastwise vessels, as follows:

"Again, although certain privileges are granted to vessels engaged in an exclusively coastwise trade, His Majesty's Government are given to understand that there is nothing in the laws of the United States which prevents any United States ship from combining foreign commerce with coastwise trade, and consequently from entering into direct competition with foreign vessels while remaining prima facie entitled to the privilege of free passage through the canal. Moreover, any restriction which may be demed to be now applicable might at any time be removed by legislation or even perhaps by mere changes in the regulations."

This objection also raises a question which, apart from treaty interpretation, depends upon future conditions and facts not yet ascertained, and for the same reasons as are above stated its submission to arbitration at this time would be premature.

The second point of Sir Edward Grey's objection to the exemption of vessels engaged in coastwise trade remains to be considered. On this point he says that the provisions of the act "would enable tolls to be fixed which would not be just and equitable, and would therefore not comply with rule 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty."

It will be observed that this statement evidently was framed without knowledge of the fact that the President's proclamation fixing the tolls had issued. It is not claimed in the note that the tolls actually fixed are not "just and equitable" or even that all vessels passing through the canal were not taken into account in fixing the amount of the tolls, but only that either or both contingencies are possible.

If the British contention is correct, that the true construction of the treaty requires all traffic to be reckoned in fixing just and equitable tolls, it requires at least an allegation that the tolls as fixed are not just and equitable, and that all traffic has not been reckoned in fixing them before the United States can be called upon to prove that this course was not followed, even assuming that the burden of proof would rest with the United States in any event, which is open to question. This Government welcomes the opportunity, however, of informing the British Government that the tolls fixed in the President's proclamation are based upon the computations set forth in the report of Prof. Emory R. Johnson, a copy of which is forwarded herewith for delivery to Sir Edward Grey, and that the tolls which would be paid by American coastwise vessels but for the exemption contained in the act were computed in determining the rate fixed by the President.

By reference to page 208 of Prof. Johnson's report, it will be seen that the estimated net tonnage of shipping using the canal in 1915 is as follows:

	Tons.
Coast to coast American shipping	1,000,000
American shipping carrying foreign commerce of the United States	720,000
Foreign shipping carrying commerce of the United States and foreign countries	8,780,000

It was on this estimate that tolls fixed in the President's proclamation were based.

That is to say, in fixing the rates we did just exactly what the British Government claimed we should do, we took into account in determining what the rates should be the shipping of our own coastwise trade. So that objection is completely met by the facts as they exist.

Sir Edward Grey says, "This rule [1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty] also provides that the tolls should be 'just and equitable.'" The purpose of these words, he adds, "was to limit the tolls to the amount representing the fair value of the services rendered, i. e., to the interest on the capital expended and the cost of the operation and maintenance of the canal." If, as a matter of fact, the tolls now fixed (of which he seems unaware) do not exceed this requirement, and as heretofore pointed out there is no claim that they do, it is not apparent under Sir Edward Grey's contention how Great Britain could be receiving unjust and inequitable treatment if the United States favors its coastwise vessels by not collecting their share of the tolls necessary to meet the requirement. There is a very clear distinction between an omission to "take into account" the coastwise tolls in order to determine a just and equitable rate, which is as far as this objection goes, and the remission of such tolls, or their collection coupled with their repayment in the form of a subsidy.

The exemption of the coastwise trade from tolls, or the refunding of tolls collected from the coastwise trade, is merely a subsidy granted by the United States to that trade, and the loss resulting from not collecting, or from refunding those tolls, will fall solely upon the United States. In the same way the loss will fall on the United States if the tolls fixed by the President's proclamation on all vessels represent less than the fair value of the service rendered, which must necessarily be the case for many years; and the United States will, therefore, be in the position of subsidizing or aiding not merely its own coastwise vessels but foreign vessels as well.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. WORKS. I do.

Mr. O'GORMAN. With the Senator's permission, I should like to direct attention at this point to one fact. It is estimated that for several years the net deficit in the operation of the canal will amount to $7,000,000 annually. As Great Britain controls more than one-half of the shipping of the world it is fair to state that at least one-half of this deficit borne by the Federal Government will be for the benefit of the British shipping, and the British shipping will be sustained by a subsidy from the United States Treasury each year to the extent of three million and a half.

Mr. WORKS. Secretary Knox says further:

> Apart from the particular objections above considered, it is not understood that Sir Edward Grey questions the right of the United States to subsidize either its coastwise or its foreign shipping, inasmuch as he says that His Majesty's Government do not find "either in the letter or in the spirit of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty any surrender by either of the contracting powers of the right to encourage its shipping or its commerce by such subsidies as it may deem expedient."
>
> When, and if, complaint is made by Great Britain that the effect of the act and the proclamation together will be to subject British vessels as a matter of fact to inequality of treatment, or to unjust and inequitable tolls in conflict with the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the question will then be raised as to whether the United States is bound by that treaty both to take into account and to collect tolls from American vessels, and also whether under the obligations of that treaty British vessels are entitled to equality of treatment in all respects with the vessels of the United States. Until these objections rest upon something more substantial than mere possibility, it is not believed that they should be submitted to arbitration.

Mr. President, these extracts from the correspondence that took place between the representatives of the two Governments show, to my mind, conclusively that there is no ground for any claim by the British Government that we have violated the treaty. Its claims were limited to the two propositions that had been set forth in the correspondence which took place between them, and both of those contentions have been conclusively met by the Secretary of State by facts which can not be disputed. Any American citizen who reads this correspondence must be convinced of the fact that we have acted within the treaty, that we have not violated any of its provisions, and that the claim made by the British Government is absolutely unfounded and unjust.

Now, why should we, under those circumstances, knowing we are right upon this question, submit to the demands of Great Britain? I am satisfied that if this question had not been reopened by the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] by the introduction of a bill to repeal this clause of the act and the making of a speech upon it that I think was unjust and unfair to his own country, the question would have been settled before this. The claims of Great Britain had been conclusively met. I have no idea that that Government would have followed it further. We have heard no complaint from Great Britain of late. The trouble is not there; it is here in our own country; it is our own people and the representatives of this Nation who are raising this question and making the contention that we were wrong in the passage of the statute.

Is it not a little singular that we should be raising this question at this stage? Why has it been done? Does the President of the United States know something that we do not know which makes it expedient or just that we should in this way give up and surrender the rights we have in the canal, including our sovereignty over it, for that is what it means? If so, when he makes his request of the Congress of the United States that our rights should be surrendered under the circumstances, why has he failed to give us a reason upon which he bases that request? He has not even said to us yet that the reasons were such that he could not properly submit them to Congress. He has simply asked us to take his word for it that there are reasons why we should surrender our rights to the demands of a foreign nation. There are Members of this body who have sufficient confidence in the President to be willing to take his mere statement of the fact that there are reasons why this should be done without calling upon him to state his reasons, that we may act intelligently in dealing with the question.

CONFIRMING OPINIONS OF OTHERS.

Mr. President, in support of what I have said as to the effect of this statute upon the treaty rights of the two nations, I submit what has been said by the following persons, amongst thousands of others, including ex-Senator Bard, ex-President Taft, ex-Secretary of State Knox, ex-Secretary of State Olney, ex-President Roosevelt, ex-Senator Dubois, numerous Members of this body, Chandler P. Anderson, ex-counselor for the Department of State, Charles J. Schnabel, and the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 332).

I have statements here, Mr. President, from most of the distinguished gentlemen to whom I have referred. I am going to read only a part of them, but I ask to be allowed to include in my remarks the remainder without reading them to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that course wil be pursued.

Mr. WORKS. I first call attention to a statement made by ex-Senator Bard, who has frequently been mentioned in this discussion. In a letter to me of date October 28, 1911, when this matter was previously under discussion, he said:

OCTOBER 28, 1911.

Hon. JOHN D. WORKS,
United States Senator, Los Angeles, Cal.

MY DEAR SENATOR:

* * * * * * *

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty, as originally drafted, was not an abrogation, but, in effect, a reaffirmation of the odious Clayton-Bulwer treaty in respect to the neutralization of the canal. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty as ratified, though intended, as stated in the preamble to both drafts, "to preserve unimpaired the general principle of neutralization established by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty," is, in effect, and by its express terms, a complete abrogation of that convention.

* * * * * * *

The omission in the ratified treaty of the declaration reiterated in article 2 of the original draft, that the parties desired to preserve the "general principle," indicates that the rules adopted in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty were to be the only regulations forming the basis of neutralization and that these rules define the full extent to which the United States is bound to apply the general principle of neutralization established by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

It is therefore altogether unnecessary to consider what other provisions contained in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty helped to explain the "general principle" of neutralizat'on that was intended to be preserved.

This argument is fully supported by the remark of Marquis of Lansdowne, when, in his communication of August 3, 1901, referring to the amendment proposed by the Senate to abrogate the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, that—

"6. The proposal to abrogate the Clayton-Bulwer convention is not, I think, inadmissible, if it can be shown that sufficient provision is made in the new treaty for such portions of the convention as ought, in the interests of this country, to remain in force."

Of course, his acquiescence to the adoption of the "rules" in the new treaty implies that, in his opinion, "sufficient provision" was made for every portion of the old treaty that is needed to protect the interests of his country.

By a like course of reasoning we understand that all provisions for neutralization of the Suez Canal contained in the convention of Constantinople, which are not fully expressed in the rules adopted by this treaty, if any, are excluded.

And therefore we may enter upon the investigation that has been proposed, free from embarrassment that might intrude, if there were doubts as to the complete abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty or as to the retention of any unsatisfied provision of it.

* * * * * * * *

The comparison of parts of article 3 of the treaty as executed with the corresponding article 2 of the original draft is important for my purpose, and they are here now set forth in parallel columns.

ARTICLE 2 OF ORIGINAL DRAFT.	ARTICLE 3 OF TREATY AS EXECUTED BY THE UNITED STATES.
The high contracting parties, desiring to preserve and maintain the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, adopt as the basis of such neutralization the following rules substantially as embodied in the convention between Great Britain and certain other powers, signed at Constantinople October 29, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Maritime Canal; that is to say	adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Maritime Canal; that is to say
1. The canal shall be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations	1. The canal shall be free and to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality. So that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise.	on terms of entire equality. So that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.
	Such conditions and charges shall be just and equitable.

I have indicated the differences in the drafts of these sections by underscoring lines.

* * * * * * *

The first change observed is very important. Opposite to the declaration that the high contracting parties adopt the rules is antithetically placed the declaration in the executed treaty that the United States alone adopts the rules.

The original draft of the treaty, in joining Great Britain with the United States, substantially reaffirmed or continued their relations in respect to this matter, which it was desirable to the United States to be terminated.

The participation of Great Britain in the adoption of the rules for neutralization of the canal was, as I thought at the time the original draft of the treaty was under consideration of the Senate, unnecessary and would lead to future complications. I contended that Great Britain, having assumed the responsibility implied in the adoption of the rules, could fairly claim the right, as incident to such responsibility, to supervise the execution of the rules, to raise questions as to the proper construction of the rules, and even to inquire into the necessity for any measure that the United States might adopt for the maintenance of public order or its own defense. Such right of supervision could readily be made the pretext for interference in our relations with Central American States. Thus Great Britain, in making this concession, resigns all responsibility for the carrying out of the regulations for securing the neutralization of the canal and leaves to the United States exclusively the right, as well as the duty, to provide for the regulation and management and to maintain the neutralization of the canal in accordance with the rules which are adopted by it for such purposes.

The excision from the original draft of the treaty of the provision of a separate article which obligated the United States and permitted Great Britain "to bring the convention to the notice of the other powers and to invite them to adhere to it," was one of the changes suggested by the Senate.

Great Britain gave at first as a reason for objecting to this proposed amendment that the omission of the article would result in binding Great Britain by stringent rules of neutral conduct that were not equally binding upon other powers, but finally agreed that by inserting, after "nation," in rule 1, the words "which shall agree to observe these rules" Great Britain would not be placed "in a less advantageous position than other powers, while it stopped short of conferring upon other nations a contractual right to the use of the canal." But this formulation of the change was not satisfactory to Mr. Hay, who suggested the simpler form, which the Marquis of Lansdowne accepted "as equally efficacious for the purpose he had in view." This final formulation of the phrase, however, changed entirely the relation of other powers to the management of the canal, as was originally proposed in the first draft of the treaty. For now the United States, if it should desire, may, with consent of Great Britain, make any material changes in the rules, without incurring any responsibility to any other power on account of such change. The United States is not responsible to any other power than Great Britain for any misinterpretation or nonobservance of the rules. The United States has no contractual obligation with any other power in respect to the observance of the rules, and the matter of their observance of the rules is for their consideration in the future and after the United States may have interpreted the rules to mean that the prohibition of discrimination does not apply to its domestic trade. The United States being the power that owns the canal, that adopts the rules, and is to be exclusively responsible for the enforcement of the rules, must necessarily be the only authority that may primarily interpret the rules.

In view of the long-settled policy of the United States, known to all the world, which forbids foreign vessels from engaging in our domestic commerce, and in view of the admitted fact that the canal was undertaken for the purpose of providing a convenient means of connection between our Atlantic and Pacific coasts, which, when completed, will substantially be a part of our coast line, it would seem that the discrimination referred to in rule 1 of the treaty could not possibly relate to a traffic in which no other nation could participate.

Therefore it would not be a discrimination against any other nation if the United States, conforming to its national policy to foster its coastwise trade, should release vessels belonging to its citizens engaged in the coastwise trade from the whole or any part of the tolls that it charges vessels belonging to its own citizens or to citizens of other nations engaged in foreign trade, nor would such discrimination be a violation of the requirement that "such charge should be fair and equitable."

* * * * * * *

Yours, very truly,

THOMAS R. BARD.

I have here also a statement of Col. Roosevelt and of a number of Members of this body bearing upon this question. I wish to read just a few of them. I read first from the statement of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], as taken from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

I think we may justly insist, I doubt whether it would be successfully controverted, that so far as our coastwise vessels are concerned, this treaty does not apply to them. Indeed, in the communication from the Attorney General embodying the views brought to our attention by Great Britain it is stated that upon that subject with proper regulations it is probable that no question by Great Britain would be made. Now, fortifying that view, one that we can logically deduce from article 3, section 1, and the attitude of Great Britain upon it with the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Galveston case, in which they held in effect that language of this kind was not applicable to coastwise vessels, that it was no discrimination under language practically similar to the language found in the treaty to extend privileges to coastwise vessels that were not extended to foreign vessels, we can sustain the provision freeing coastwise vessels from tolls.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WORKS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator has been quoting the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] down to this point?

Mr. WORKS. I have. That position squarely sustains the contention that the treaty does not apply to coastwise vessels.

I do not know how true it may be, but it is currently stated that the Senator from Georgia, who made this explicit statement respecting the effect of the treaty and our right to relieve our coastwise trade from the payment of tolls, is now leading the opposition to this statute and advocating the repeal that is now urged. It will be interesting to hear some of these Democratic Senators explain to the Senate upon what ground they have changed their position. Nothing new has been developed that I know of that could affect the mind of any Member of this body.

Then, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] said:

Mr. President, I shall vote for the exemption of the coastwise vessels of the United States, but I hope not upon the grounds laid down by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] in his fourth speech upon the subject. I shall vote for the exemption of the coastwise vessels of the United States upon the ground laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in Olsen against Smith, in One hundred and ninety-fifth United States, that ground being, in short, that as foreign vessels never had any standing in the coastwise trade at all, any provisions with regard to the coastwise trade can not be a discrimination.

* * * * * * *

I shall vote to exempt coastwise vessels from these tolls, because I think we have a right to do it. I think the principle laid down by the Supreme Court is a correct principle in municipal and in international law.

I want the Senate to bear in mind when the Senator from Mississippi comes to deal with this question, as he undoubtedly will, that he placed himself squarely upon the proposition that it was only where there was discrimination against England that she could complain. It is an admitted fact in the correspondence which has taken place between the two Governments that there can be no discrimination so far as the coastwise business is concerned.

Then we have the statement of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON], who said:

It is contended by some that this language includes the United States in the term "all nations," and hence precludes her from extending favors to her own citizens or commerce not extended to the citizens or commerce of other countries, while others maintain that the term "all nations" necessarily means all other nations, and does not preclude us from favoring our own people, but only binds us to deal impartially with all other people.

As for myself, I had no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the United States had under the terms of the treaty the undoubted right to exempt from the payment of tolls all American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade.

It is a well-known legal rule that in the interpretation of a statute its context must be studied and the spirit and object of the law sought for.

We see in the first part of the disputed paragraph that the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of all nations on terms of entire equality; but we also see in the second part of the same paragraph that the end sought to be accomplished by this first part, the spirit and object of the law as it were, is that there shall be no discrimination against any nation.

It is a question of discrimination; there is no question about that. Unless England is in some way discriminated against in one of the two ways mentioned by her, she has no ground at all to contend against this claim.

Now, it is well known that at the time of this treaty the ships of no other nation were permitted to do business in the coastwise trade of the United States, and that is the law still, and certainly it can not be abrogated by this treaty.

It follows, then, that as no foreign ship can operate in our coastwise trade and compete with us in that trade we are not discriminating against such ships by allowing to our own coastwise ships the free use of the canal.

These were the views I expressed in the committee sessions, as will appear by the printed report of the proceedings, and I voted in accordance with them.

This Senator has openly stated on the floor of the Senate that he proposes to support a bill to repeal that clause in the statute that he sustained, running all through the hearings, and he puts it upon the sole ground that the President of the United States has said to him there are reasons why this should be done.

Mr. President, I have a good deal of confidence in the integrity and good faith of the President of the United States. I have no inclination to dispute the fact that he is acting out of proper motives in this matter. But when it comes to a Senator acting under oath who changes his views upon an important question of this kind, that affects the honor and integrity of this Nation, I should think he would want stronger reasons for it than the mere fact that somebody else, no matter whether he is President of the United States or anyone else, has said that there are reasons why it should be done.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WORKS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Right on that point I think it would be a good idea to insert the oath of office of Senators. The oath administered to every Senator reads:

You do solemnly swear (or affirm) that you will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that you will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that you take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion.

Surely Senators whom the Senator has just quoted must have had some "mental reservation" to have changed their course in order to conform to a new presidential decree.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, there are a number of other quotations from Democratic and other Senators that I will include in my remarks, but will not read.

The matter referred to is as follows:

EXTRACT FROM LETTER OF THEODORE ROOSEVELT IN OUTLOOK, JANUARY 18, 1913.

[From the Congressional Record, February 6, 1913.]

I believe that the position of the United States is proper as regards this coastwise traffic. I think that we have the right to free bona fide coastwise traffic from tolls. I think that this does not interfere with the rights of any other nation, because no ships but our own can engage in coastwise traffic, so that there is no discrimination against other ships when we relieve the coastwise traffic from tolls. I believe that the only damage that would be done is the damage to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Moreover, I do not think that it sits well on the representatives of any foreign nation, even upon those of a power with which we are, and I hope and believe will always remain, on such good terms as Great Britain, to make any plea in reference to what we do with our own coastwise traffic, because we are benefiting the whole world by our action at Panama, and are doing this where every dollar of expense is paid by ourselves. In all history I do not believe you can find another instance where as great and expensive a work as the Panama Canal, undertaken not by a private corporation but by a nation, has ever been as generously put at the service of all the nations of mankind.

OPINIONS OF SENATORS.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 17, 1912.]

Mr. LODGE. The second Hay-Pauncefote treaty, as Senators will remember, embodied in substance the amendments which the Senate had made to the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty. England had refused to accept those amendments, and then the second treaty was made embodying in principle all for which the Senate had contended.

When I reported that treaty my own impression was that it left the United States in complete control of the tolls upon its own vessels. I did not suppose then that there was any limitation put upon our right to charge such tolls as we pleased upon our own vessels, or that we were included in the phrase "all nations."

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 20, 1912.]

Mr. LODGE. While I am on my feet, if the Senator will allow me, there is one other thing I should like to say. I said in my remarks a few days ago that my personal view was that we had the right to exempt American vessels from tolls. I did not go into the matter. I took a somewhat active part in the two Hay-Pauncefote treaties, as they are called. I voted against the Bard amendment. I voted against it in the belief that it was unnecessary; that the right to fix tolls, if we built the canal or it was built under our auspices, was undoubted. I know that was the view taken by the then Senator from Minnesota, Mr. Davis, who was at that time chairman of the committee. I certainly so stated on the floor. * * * I had that same view in regard to this treaty. I was familiar with the work that was done upon it in London at the time when it was concluded there and finally agreed to, and I was very familiar with it here. Although, as the Senator from Georgia correctly said, the question was not raised at that time, I personally have never had any doubt that the matter of fixing the tolls must necessarily be within our jurisdiction.

* * * * * * *

Before I sit down I should like, if I may, to call attention to one thing in this connection. We are now so familiarized with Panama that we think of nothing else. But in the preamble of the treaty that was adopted, the actual Hay-Pauncefote treaty, you will notice that it says:

"Being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise."

The route that was in everybody's mind at that time was the Nicaragua route. There was no possible prospect of our securing there what we have secured in Panama. All we could have hoped to secure from Nicaragua and Costa Rica would have been the right to build a canal. Therefore the situation contemplated by that treaty was one quite different from that which has arisen. That which has arisen was also contemplated as possible.

[From the Congressional Record, January 22, 1913.]

Mr. NEWLANDS. In the passage of the act relating to the operation and maintenance of this canal Congress, pursuing its traditional policy of maintaining an untrammeled, an unburdened, and an unfettered domestic waterway transportation, and regarding the Panama Canal, in addition to its international use, as a great domestic waterway connecting the waterway systems of the two coasts and enabling free communication by water between them, declared that no tolls should be levied upon ships passing through the canal engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States.

England, under the inspiration of Canada—that inspiration doubtless quickened by the action of the transcontinental Canadian railroad, whose action in turn was quickened by that of American transcontinental railroads—protests against this declaration that no tolls shall be levied upon ships in the coastwise trade as a violation of the rule of equality fixed by solemn treaty between England and the United States.

* * * * * * *

Mr. President, why was it that we declared in the act that no tolls should be levied upon ships engaged in our coastwise trade? We did it, first, because we had imposed upon international tonnage very much less than a fair proportionate charge of our cost of operation, maintenance, and interest, and therefore, in justice to domestic commerce, we could exempt American ships. We did it, further, in pursuance of the traditional policy of the United States, which demanded, so far as our domestic waterways are concerned, that our rivers should be improved, our lakes developed, our canals constructed at the expense of the National Treasury, and without imposing a dollar of burden upon the commerce of the country.

Was it to be expected that the United States, having pursued this traditional policy for over a century, should, when it was assuming the position of a benefactor to the commerce of the world, abandon it and substitute for an unfettered and unburdened domestic commerce a fettered and a burdened commerce?

Now, Mr. President, what is the occasion of this difficulty? What has been the difficulty all the way through with reference to the Panama Canal? Our difficulty has always been the opposition of the transcontinental railway carriers of the country, determined, first, to prevent interoceanic communication and then to paralyze it by the burdens imposed upon it. It was for this reason that for years they prevented and delayed the inauguration of the canal enterprise, and that, later on, as its completion approached, they sought to induce us to permit ships owned by transcontinental railroads to traverse the canal, knowing very well from past experience that, through their ownership of ships subsidized by the profits from the rail traffic, they could paralyze water transportation. Then, having failed in that, they were eager to have us impose a burden upon the domestic transportation between the two coasts in the shape of tolls, such burdens as all the other waterway transportation of the country is entirely free from.

Having failed to influence and control our legislation, they then sought their brother carrier to the north, in Canada—a transcontinental railway running from ocean to ocean, and interested with the transcontinental railroads of the United States in monopolizing transportation between the two oceans and in paralyzing the canal. They sought to make that railroad the instrumentality of foreign interference, and through it they appealed to its sovereign country—Great Britain—to protest against this action as a discrimination against foreign commerce, in violation of the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

* * * * * * *

All that foreign nations have the right to insist upon is not that we should allow them to control our domestic policy, but that, in carrying out the domestic policy, which involves levying no tolls upon domestic ships, we should see to it that the tolls remitted are not imposed as an additional charge upon the ships of foreign nations. That is all the right which they have, either in morals or under treaty obligations.

* * * * * * *

Shall we, simply because the Canadian transcontinental railway has united with the American transcontinental railways to secure foreign intervention in order to secure them a monopoly of the transportation of the country, and in order to enable them to paralyze the Panama Canal as an instrumentality of commerce, shall we meekly yield to this demand—this demand not based upon justice or equity—that we should abandon our traditional domestic policy of a free and unfettered domestic commerce? Will we not discharge every obligation to the nations of the world, and will we not further increase their obligations to us, by declaring that all the tolls remitted to domestic ships shall be credited upon the interest charge of the United States against the nations of the world for the construction and conduct of this gigantic enterprise?

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 18, 1912.]

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is insisted by some distinguished lawyers that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty forbids us to impose tolls upon foreign canal shipping if we permit our coastwise boats to pass through the canal free, but it seems to me there can be no good reason, and I say this respectfully, for at least none has been shown to me, for such belief. Certain it is that no foreign boat can now engage in our coastwise trade—in our interstate commerce—nor could they do so when this treaty was made, and if we now permit our American boats engaged in our coastwise trade and with which no foreign boat is allowed under existing law to compete to pass without charge through the canal are we discriminating against English or German or other foreign tonnage when we impose tolls upon it? How is the foreigner affected by this alleged discrimination? Certain it is we are not changing his relations to the American, for we are in this particular case dealing with commerce with which the former has not now, nor will he have after the completion of the canal, anything to do. This is a purely local matter and unaffected, so far as the foreigner is concerned, by the canal. If all of our transcontinental commerce now carried by the railroads was transferred to water carriers through the canal without tolls, would any foreign boat be denied any advantage which it now enjoys or which it could enjoy through the canal under the existing law as to coastwise traffic, which law it is not proposed to change?

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 7, 1912.]

Mr. CUMMINS. Let us see. The House of Representatives passed a bill which in its terms proposed to give to the shipping of the United States a lower toll, or some greater advantage, than it proposed to give to the shipping of the world. Thereupon, Great Britain formally presented a protest to the United States, through the Secretary of State, who esteems it to be his duty—as I have no doubt it was—to lay the protest before the Congress of the country. * * * Her protest here stands as a notice to the Congress of the United States that, if we pass the law which attempts to discriminate between our shipping and the shipping of the rest of the world, she would regard it as a violation of the treaty of 1901.

Tell me, if you can, how we are to escape, if we wanted to escape, the duty of answering that protest. If we do not now assert whatever right we have under this treaty, we will surrender it forever, and in my opinion the Congress that does surrender it will be universally condemned, and the administration that participates in the surrender will be remembered only to be condemned so long as free institutions exist in the United States and so long as the spirit of independence prevails in the hearts of Americans. All that, however, is upon the assumption that the interpretation which I believe this treaty bears and which has been asserted by the House of Representatives is true and just, and it is to that question I intend to devote my time.

* * * * * * *

* * * I believe, and it can be conclusively shown, that the treaty contains no promise on the part of the United States that it will extend to the other nations of the world the same tolls and the same conditions that we give to our own shipping. There is no such promise in the treaty. It was never intended that there should be any such promise in the treaty.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, August 6, 1912.]

Mr. JONES. Is there any treaty that restricts our power to permit the use of this canal by our own people upon such terms as we see fit to impose? Could any treaty be made that limits and restricts the power and right of the Government to deal with its own people and its own property? In my judgment the treaty-making power can not take away or cede away this right. The Senate and the President can not deprive the United States of any of its rights of sovereignty, and that is what this would be doing. If it be said that this is not ceding away sovereign rights, but it is giving or granting proprietary rights, I say this can not be done by the President and the Senate in the exercise of the treaty-making power. The right to use our canal and the territory through which it runs as we may desire is a property right, and the establishment of rules respecting the use of this canal is the establishment of rules in respect to the property or territory of the United States, and under section 3, Article IV, of the Constitution only "the Congress," and not the Senate and the President, "shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." Any treaty purporting to make rules and regulations respecting that canal or the territory through which it passes and purporting to restrict its use by the United States is beyond the power of the President and the Senate and not binding upon the Government or the people of the United States. It will not be presumed that an attempt was made to do what there was no constitutional power to do.

* * * * * * *

Surely no one will contend that the President and Mr. Hay, who negotiated that treaty, and the Senate, which ratified it, intended to give up our right to allow our own ships to use our own canal and our own territory as we might deem best. They were patriotic men, devoted to the welfare of our country and jealous of its rights and the rights of its citizens, and I will not believe that they intended anything of the sort. If the people of this country believe that they intended to give up such rights, no words could express their indignation, and such a deliberate intention would be regarded as little short of faithlessness to the great trust reposed in them. If they had thought so when this treaty was pending, such a wave of indignation would have swept the country as would have buried such treaty in oblivion. I am sure, and the people believe, that they simply agreed that the United States would treat all nations with absolute impartiality, and insure equal treatment among them without depriving itself of any of its sovereign or proprietary rights and without recognizing the right of any people to interfere or question its treatment of its own people in regard to its own property and territory.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 7, 1912.]

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. To include the United States in the words "all nations" would practically make us powerless to protect ourselves even against an adversary in time of war, and we would be placed in the anomalous position of putting naval armaments of other nations through the canal to destroy our coastwise cities and give to them the same facilities that we would be allowed to give to our own vessels being transferred from one coast to the other to protect those same cities against the enemy's vessels. I know that Senators have said that the condition of war is an anomalous condition, and that all treaties are suspended during times of war, and yet these gentlemen are sticklers for the strictest construction of the language of that treaty. Their theory ought to go the full length, and it ought to be observed in time of war as well as any other time, because wars can not more seriously affect the interests of the country than would our interests be affected if the construction which some Senators seek to place upon this treaty is placed upon it.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 29, 1912.]

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I deny that the people of the United States have known all the time or know now that our Government has no right to extend any privileges to our commerce which goes through this canal. Had the people of the United States thought that such would be the result, the canal would never have been constructed. They never would have been willing to expend $400,000,000 to build a canal for the joint use of all the nations of the earth in which they had no superior right.

I affirm as the first proposition that under the treaty now in force the Government of the United States has the right to give preference to its own commerce as well as its battleships.

In the second place, I affirm that if this be not true and if the treaty is to be given the strict construction contended for by those who oppose us, that the treaty is an absolute nullity, because by its terms we have endangered the very life of our own country.

In the third place, I affirm that the United States having become the owner of this territory, having become the sovereign therein, for which right they have paid, the United States having bought all the rights and property of the New Panama Canal Co., for which it has paid, not only the canal but the land which adjoins it is the absolute property of the United States, as much so as is Alaska, as much so as is the District of Columbia; and that any question which may arise in regard to these matters is not subject to arbitration, because it is a domestic question, and the United States never has submitted and never will submit the decision of a domestic question to any court of this earth.

In the fourth place, our only duty as to the nations of the world—aside from our own—is to give them perfect equality in the use of the canal, to preserve strict neutrality as between them in case of war, and to charge them no more than just and equitable tolls.

In the fifth place, now that the United States has become the sovereign of the country through which the canal passes, our right to control it is purely a domestic right, and any question affecting the same is not the subject of arbitration by The Hague or any other tribunal, but must of right be settled by ourselves. That the changed conditions render the treaty voidable whatever may be its construction.

EX-SENATOR FRED T. DUBOIS.

I was a Member of the Senate at the time of the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and voted for its ratification. I recall the consideration of the treaty and the debate, and I entertained no doubt as to the meaning of the treaty. I did not myself, and I do not believe that my colleagues, generally speaking, understood that this treaty in any way deprived the United States of the right to favor its coastwise trade or deprive it of what I consider the sovereign power to deal with its domestic commerce. In my opinion had any such view prevailed the treaty would have been rejected.

Furthermore, the construction which has been placed upon this treaty, not only by those who voted for its ratification but by the whole American people, practically speaking, ought to be conclusive. It is too late now to barter away upon a false construction the interests of the whole American people, and those who undertake to do so will, in my judgment, have to answer for their acts. The Democratic Party clearly and unmistakably declared in favor of free tolls for coastwise trade, the third party platform did the same, and the candidate of the Republican Party signed the bill providing for free tolls. If a thorough, complete, and universal construction could be placed upon a treaty, it has been given to this treaty, and I regard the effort to sacrifice the interests of the people of the United States by a false construction as most unwise and indefensible.

AN ADDRESS ON THE ISSUES BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN IN REGARD TO PANAMA CANAL TOLLS AS RAISED IN THE RECENT DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE.

(By Chandler P. Anderson, former Counselor for the Department of State.)

In support of the British contention that the words "all nations observing these rules," as used in rule 1, include the United States, and therefore that British vessels using the canal are entitled to equal treatment with those of the United States, the only argument advanced by Great Britain is that the general principle of neutralization established by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, as the basis of which principle the United States adopted these rules, is in effect nothing more than a general principle of equality of treatment.

Before taking up this argument it is necessary to examine briefly the provisions of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and trace their connection with the present treaty. Article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty recites:

"The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection by treaty stipulations to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America."

The first seven articles of that treaty related exclusively to interoceanic communications across Central America, and it was distinctly understood by Great Britain in making that treaty that the Isthmus of Panama was not regarded as a part of Central America. This article of the treaty, therefore, is the only part of the treaty which had any relation to a canal across the Isthmus of Panama. The significance of this is that this article expressed the only rights Great Britain ever had in relation to the Panama Canal route, so that Great Britain has actually sacrificed nothing by abrogating the rest of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. In other words, if the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was in force to-day article 8 is the only part of it which would apply to the Panama Canal, and, in so far as the effect of article 8 has been changed by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, it will be found that these changes have been made at Great Britain's suggestion.

The article then continues:

"In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford."

It is evident from this clause of the article that the agreement to extend protection was a conditional one, and the condition was that charges imposed on traffic should be approved by both Governments as just and equitable, and that the canal should be open to their citizens and subjects upon equal terms.

It is clear that the right to equal treatment went hand in hand with the obligation to extend protection, but the general principle established by this article related primarily to the protection of the canal, the object being to secure its neutralization, and as an inducement to granting protection it was provided that equality of treatment should go with it. Clearly neutralization as used there meant exemption from interference, and equality of treatment was only incidental as an inducement to noninterference.

Mr. WORKS. I wish to call atttention now to an address delivered by Hon. Richard Olney upon this question and to read a portion of it. I think it is one of the clearest statements upon this question that I have run across in my investigation. I read from that address as follows:

Since accepting its inevitable rôle of the canal builder and owner, the United States has always and consistently stood on its rights as such, and, beyond agreeing to the neutralization of the canal as between customers, has repudiated the idea of any control of the canal except its own.

How clearly such is the case is shown by the briefest examination of the neutralization provided for in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the principle of which is not to be impaired by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. What sort of neutralization is it? First, the United States and Great Britain are to determine what are just and equitable charges for the use of the canal by their citizens or subjects; second, the canal shall be open on those same terms to citizens and subjects of other States; but, third, the citizens and subjects of other States shall have the benefit of those terms only if such other States grant the same protection to the canal as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford. Now, there is no element of this species of neutralization which the Hay-Pauncefote treaty leaves unimpaired, since the United States alone fixes reasonable and equitable rules for the canal traffic, since the canal may be used by all nations on no other condition than that they observe those rules, and since (as shown by the elimination from this treaty of article 3 of the unratified Hay-Pauncefote treaty of February, 1901) adherence to the treaty by the other powers is not to be invited. If, by construing article 8 in connection with other articles of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, any controlling principle of neutralization is to be deduced, it is the simple requirement that the same terms shall be made to all customers of the canal, a requirement restricting the rights of the canal owner to just that extent and no more and not disabling it from treating its own shipping in any way it sees fit. The like result follows from the Constantinople convention of 1828, which is declared to be the basis of the neutralization of the canal and of the rules laid down in article 8 for its navigation. By that convention identical rules are to apply to all vessels using the Suez Canal in time of war or time of peace, without distinction of flags, but "the rights of Turkey as the territorial power are reserved"—together with the sovereign rights of the Sultan and the rights and immunities of the Khedive.

It has been contended that the Senate of the United States understood the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to mean what Great Britain now claims it to mean because of the Senate's failure to pass the Bard resolution in favor of American coastwise shipping. But the claim seems to be thoroughly disposed of by proof that the reason of the failure was the opinion of Senators that the resolution was superfluous, that nothing in the treaty prohibited the United States, as the builder and owner of the canal, from exempting its coastwise shipping from tolls. Senator Bard himself has since so stated in a letter which was publicly read in the House of Representatives. He is emphatically corroborated on that point by other Senators.

It is also contended that American vessels must pay tolls, because otherwise the reasonable and equitable tolls provided for by the treaty can not be ascertained. The contention assumes, of course, the very thing at issue, namely, that in the contemplation of the treaty and by its true construction American vessels are bound to pay tolls. But no other answer seems to be required than that, for the purpose of computing reasonable tolls for the use of the canal, it is not necessary that American vessels should pay tolls, but only that the amount they would pay if they were not exempt should be calculated and used in the computation as if paid.

To sum up the conclusions resulting from the foregoing considerations, it is submitted that—

1. The United States, as builder and owner of an artificial waterway within its own territory, is entitled to dictate the conditions of its use unless and only so far as it has contracted the right away.

2. It has made no such contract, except with Great Britain, and by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and by the clauses of that treaty which stipulate for the use of the canal by "all nations" on equal terms and for reasonable and equitable tolls.

3. As the term "all nations" comprehends not only States, but their nationals, the crucial question is. Are the words "all nations" inclusive or exclusive of the United States and its nationals?

4. The principle is well settled that a State conveys away its rights of sovereignty or property only by terms which are clear and express and are not susceptible of any other reasonable construction. If the terms are vague and of doubtful import, the presumption is against the State's intention to part with or abridge its jurisdictional or property rights.

5. Hence, as the term "all nations," as used in the treaty, may be taken to mean either all without exception or all except the United States, the latter meaning is to be accepted as the true one because the least restrictive of the normal rights and powers of the United States.

6. But it is unnecessary to rely upon presumption. The treaty assumes the United States to be the owner of a canal to be built by it on its own territory, and must be taken to have had as its natural and legitimate aim the fixing of the terms upon which other nations might use it. Except as necessarily abridged by such terms, nothing in the treaty indicates any purpose to further abridge the rights of the United States as canal builder and owner.

7. In short, the treaty is an instrument by which the proprietor of a canal fixes and states the terms of use to its customers.

There is an utter absence of evidence that the United States regarded itself as one of its customers.

8. The neutralization proposed by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty resembles that proposed by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty only in the idea that the operating charges and rules for use of the canal shall be the same for all nations. It differs, of course, in the vital features of conditioning such equality of terms upon protection being afforded to the canal.

9. When five out of six of the treaty rules for the use of the canal do not apply to the United States, it is a reasonable conclusion that the sixth also was not meant so to apply.

10. The different phases of American public and official sentiment respecting the canal are noteworthy and not to be overlooked in construing the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

While the United States was expecting to be merely one of the users of the canal, it strenuously insisted upon equality of rules and charges for the use of the canal, and did not concern itself about the rights of the canal owner.

When the rôle of builder and owner of the canal was forced upon it, it as strenuously insisted upon complete ownership and complete control and complete elimination of all foreign participation or control.

Its purposes and views are completely defeated if the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is to be construed according to the British contention, and the United States has lost the ordinary and normal right of the canal owner to be exempt from the tolls and charges it makes to customers.

* * * * * * *

The United States possesses no more costly, and perhaps no more valuable, piece of territory than the Panama Canal, and Great Britain's claim is that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty not only encumbers that territory with equal rights of use by all other nations, but impresses upon it a servitude by which the United States loses the free use of its own canal for its own vessels.

In an article written by Mr. Charles J. Schnabel, of Portland, Oreg., he says:

The rule of law in construing a latent ambiguity is to put the parties back in the original position and then determine the intent or purpose by the prior existing circumstances. Under this rule can it be believed that England had any other thought in mind at the time of negotiating the canal treaty than the protection of her ships of commerce and of war against discrimination in favor of any other nation with whom she might be in commercial competition or engaged in hostilities, or will it be believed that our Senate would have ratified the treaty or the American people consented to assume the expense of constructing or maintaining the canal in the meaning that England would now attach to the language constituting the disputed ambiguity?

Again, why did England remain silent when this country appropriated and spent money to fortify the canal, since no fortifications can be needed for a neutral waterway, open to the ships of all nations and which all nations are equally bound to protect from interference? The interpretation demanded by England, if correct, includes right of passage of warships as well as vessels of commerce. Of what avail, then, or limited avail to us, is the canal in case of war between ourselves and others if the same right of passage be accorded our enemies' war vessels as our own? And what would happen if one of our fleet met a hostile ship in the passage? Under such circumstances upon what nation would devolve the duty of maintaining the peace of the canal—England or America?

What amazes me in this momentous question is not so much England's contention as the apparent indifference of the American people and the lack of comprehension of the merits of the dispute on the part of public men who are expressing opinions regarding the subject.

If we repeal the tolls exemption, we yield a principle we can never again assert, except in the face of the combined armies and navies of the world. There is a difference between the express or affirmative consent granted in a disputed point and the determination of that point against one after a protested submission to an overruling arbitration. What national peril or other grave exigency at this time forces this country to sacrifice the heritage of unborn generations of American citizens? What will posterity think of such an exhibition of shortsighted statesmanship?

I have upon that point an extract from the syllabus and from the body of the decision in the case of Olsen v. Smith, reported in One hundred and ninety-fifth United States Reports, page 332. That decision has been referred to frequently here. It goes directly to the very point now at issue, and should be controlling upon a question of this kind, so far as the legal phases of it are concerned.

Under a treaty between the United States and Great Britain it was provided that British vessels should not be subject to any higher or other charges than vessels of the United States. It was held not to be a violation of the treaty to exempt vessels doing a coastwise business from the payment of pilotage charges where such charges were made against vessels doing a foreign trade. The syllabus of the case is as follows:

A State pilotage law, subjecting all vessels, domestic and foreign, engaged in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, but which exempts pursuant to law coastwise steam vessels of the United States, is not in conflict with provisions in the treaty between the United States and Great Britain to the effect that British vessels shall not be subject to any higher or other charges than vessels of the United States.

The opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice White, now Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. In considering that branch of the case, he said:

Nor is there merit in the contention that as the vessel in question was a British vessel coming from a foreign port the State laws concerning pilotage are in conflict with a treaty between Great Britain and the United States, providing that "no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States." Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage, resulting from the law of the United States, nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law, concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade. In substance the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations, therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even though such regulations apply, without discrimination, to all vessels engaged in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign.

IMPOSITION OF TOLLS ON COASTWISE SHIPS A VIOLATION OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. President, I pass to another phase of this question and submit that the imposition of tolls on our coastwise ships is in violation of the Constitution of the United States. If so, the President is not only asking us to betray the rights of the people of this country by surrendering to Great Britain, but he is asking us, at the same time, to violate the Constitution of our own country. I call attention to the following paragraphs in the Constitution. Article I, section 9, subdivision 6, provides:

No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another, nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

Section 9, subdivision 5:

No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State.

Section 10, subdivision 2:

No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duties on imports or exports.

Subdivision 3:

No State shall, without such consent, lay any duty of tonnage.

Mr. President, probably the question of the equality of the States in the matter of commerce was as fully discussed in the Constitutional Convention as was almost any other question that was there raised, and every effort was made to secure absolute equality of commerce as between the several States. The constitutional provisions to which I have referred relate both to the National Government and to the States, and forbid either of them to levy any tax or tonnage or to in any other way prefer the ports of one State as against those of another. Suppose we levy tolls upon the coastwise trade that passes through the Panama Canal. We have spent $137,000,000 to make and maintain the Mississippi River a navigable stream; we have spent $28,000,000 on the Ohio River; we have spent $13,000,000 on the Missouri River; we have constructed at national expense and are now maintaining canals connecting the Great Lakes and other bodies of water that are free to commerce; and just at this very time we are proposing to buy from private individuals the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal for the purpose of making it a free canal for the use of the commerce of this country.

New Orleans can ship her goods by way of the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers, costing jointly $165,000,000, from that city to St. Louis or to Pittsburgh or to any of the intervening ports along the way in the different States, and commerce going to those ports is not taxed by the National Government. If, on the other hand, New Orleans proposes to ship some of her goods through the Panama Canal to any of the ports upon the Pacific coast, those ports or New Orleans must pay an additional tax of $1.25 a ton upon the goods so shipped. I am not talking now of the mere matter of justice or fairness as between the ports in the country; I am talking about the constitutional inhibition of the kind of legislation that burdens the ports of one State more heavily than those of another in the transaction of its business.

Mr. President, we have spent in all for the improvement of rivers and harbors in this country, not including the Panama Canal, over $700,000,000, and not in a single instance do we charge any tolls in connection with any of those streams, harbors, or canals. If we impose on American coastwise vessels a tax for passing through the Panama Canal, we are violating the express provision of the Constitution of the United States. Does the Senate think, whether the President of the United States asks it or not, that we, who are sworn to support the Constitution, should surrender our rights and the provisions of the Constitution under which we are acting and, in violation of the Constitution, impose tolls on ships passing through the Panama Canal?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understood the Senator to say we have spent $28,000,000 on the Ohio River.

Mr. WORKS. That is my understanding.

Mr. GALLINGER. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the official figures given in reference to all harbors and rivers show that we have spent over $29,000,000 on that river, and that $51,000,000 more will be required to complete the Ohio River project, making a total of $80,000,000, much of which has been authorized.

Mr. WORKS. I have secured from the Treasury Department figures showing the cost of improving the various navigable streams, harbors, and so on, up to the end of the last fiscal year, and have been basing my statements upon those figures.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to know if along the Ohio River or the Mississippi River or any of the Government canals in this country there are locks and dams operated at the expense of the Government?

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. Is there any toll charge to boats passing through any of these waterways?

Mr. WORKS. None at all.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No tolls are charged in the St. Marys River.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, in this connection, I call the attention of the Senate to Story on the Constitution of the United States, volume 1, page 736, in which he says:

1013. The next clause in the Constitution is: "No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State. (a) No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; (b) nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another."

1014. The obvious object of these provisions is to prevent any possibility of applying the power to lay taxes or regulate commerce injuriously to the interests of any one State so as to favor or aid another. If Congress were allowed to lay a duty on exports from any one State, it might unreasonably injure, or even destroy, the staple productions or common articles of that State. The inequality of such a tax would be extreme. In some of the States the whole of their means result from agricultural exports. In others a great portion is derived from other sources—from external fisheries, from freights, and from the profits of commerce in its largest extent. The burden of such a tax would, of course, be very unequally distributed. The power is therefore wholly taken away to intermeddle with the subject of exports. On the other hand, preferences might be given to the ports of one State by regulations either of commerce or revenue, which might confer on them local facilities or privileges in regard to commerce or revenue. And such preferences might be equally fatal if indirectly given under the milder form of requiring an entry, clearance, or payment of duties in the ports of any State other than the ports of the State to or from which the vessel was bound. The last clause, therefore, does not prohibit Congress from requiring an entry or clearance or payment of duties at the customhouse on importations in any port of a State to or from which the vessel is bound, but cuts off the right to require such acts to be done in other States to which the vessel is not bound. In other words, it cuts off the power to require that circuity of voyage which, under the British colonial system, was employed to interrupt the American commerce before the Revolution. No American vessel could then trade with Europe unless through a circuitous voyage to and from a British port.

1015. The first part of the clause was reported in the first draft of the Constitution. But it did not pass without opposition, and several attempts were made to amend it, as by inserting after the word "duty" the words "for the purpose of revenue," and by inserting at the end of it "unless by consent of two-thirds of the legislature," both of which propositions were negatived. It was then passed by a vote of 7 States against 4.

Subsequently, the remaining parts of the clause were proposed by report of a committee, and they appear to have been adopted without objection. Upon the whole the wisdom and sound policy of this restriction can not admit of reasonable doubt, not so much that the powers of the General Government were likely to be abused as that the constitutional prohibition would allay jealousies and confirm confidence. The prohibition extends not only to exports but to the exporter. Congress can no more rightfully tax the one than the other.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. WORKS. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. In connection with the interrogatory propounded by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], as to whether tolls were collected on the locks and dams built by the Government, I wish to say that it is my recollection—and I think I am absolutely correct in the matter—that there is a statute specifically prohibiting the collection of tolls on the St. Marys River, and I think that prohibition will be found possibly to include other waterways in the country.

Mr. KENYON. Is that applicable only to the St. Marys River?

Mr. GALLINGER. I simply know that there is such a statute applying to that river, and I am not quite sure that it is not a general statute; I have not examined it recently.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. O'GORMAN. My recollection is that in the river and harbor bill of 1884 there is an express provision that no toll or charge shall be imposed on any vessels using any of the improvements in the rivers, harbors, or canals provided for by the bill.

Mr. KENYON. That would apply to foreign vessels likewise.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. KENYON. But, of course, a foreign vessel would not be engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That is correct.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WORKS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I do not wish to break the continuity of the Senator's remarks.

Mr. WORKS. That has already been done.

Mr. WEST. I understand that; but I ask to interrupt the Senator right here on account of the questions put by others. There are some things with reference to this matter which I do not understand, and one of them is this: A boat bound from New York to San Francisco would pass through the canal free, while a boat sailing from England to San Francisco would have to pay tolls of a dollar and a quarter a ton. Now, is not the United States differentiating to the extent of a dollar and a quarter a ton against the coastwise boat plying between New York and Savannah or between any other ports on the Atlantic coast? A foreign vessel going west passing through the canal would have that dollar and a quarter a ton to pay, whereas if she entered New York she would not have the dollar and a quarter a ton to pay, and likewise a boat from Japan or any other eastern country coming east through the canal would have a dollar and a quarter a ton to pay, and for that reason there would be a manifest difference against the coastwise trade of America that did not go through the canal to the extent of a dollar and a quarter a ton, or whatever the canal toll might be.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I was only dealing with the coastwise trade. The Government of the United States forbids foreign nations to participate in that trade at all, and therefore it is a purely domestic question that is involved in this constitutional provision. It has no relation to any inequality that may result to a ship which, as the Senator suggests, is carrying foreign goods. But the Senator from Georgia is entirely correct in his statement.

Mr. WEST. The point I wish to make clear to the mind of the Senator from California is that we are differentiating between our own coastwise trade; in other words, we are partial in the distribution of our gifts. If we have a ship subsidy applying to all the vessels engaged in our coastwise trade, that is a different thing; but when we come to put a subsidy upon all coastwise ships passing through the canal, we differentiate to the extent of a dollar and a quarter against the other coastwise shipping that does not go through the canal. That is the position I take.

Mr. WORKS. Well, Mr. President, the Senator is right. But we are not giving any subsidy to ships passing through the canal at all. If we exempt them from tolls, we are simply putting them on an equality with other ships passing through other navigable waters in this country. It does not bear any resemblance to a subsidy.

I read further from Story on the Constitution, volume 2, page 10, section 1066:

The importance of the power of regulating commerce among the States, for the purposes of the Union, is scarcely less than that of regulating it with foreign States. A very material object of this power is the relief of the States which import and export through other States from the levy of improper contributions on them by the latter. If each State were at liberty to regulate the trade between State and State, it is easy to foresee that ways would be found out to load the articles of import and export during the passage through the jurisdiction with duties which should fall on the makers of the latter and the consumers of the former.

Now, the granting of preferences by the National Government is just as clearly prohibited. If it shall charge tolls for passing over a part of the territory owned by the United States in order to reach certain ports that is not imposed upon shipping going by another way to other ports, it is a very clear discrimination and violates the Constitution.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WORKS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from California just made a very interesting statement and has raised a point which I do not remember to have heard before, as to the constitutionality of this proposed legislation. With the legal argument which the Senator has made heretofore I agree entirely. To the proposition which he now makes I do not find myself quite able to assent. The Senator calls attention to this provision of the Constitution, which, as I understand, is really the provision upon which he relies:

No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another, nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

I should like to suggest to the Senator that so far as the latter clause is concerned—nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another—it certainly can have no application, because the vessel is not required under this law to clear or pay duties or enter in another port.

Mr. WORKS. No; that has no application.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. So we come back to the first proposition:

No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another.

By the imposition of these tolls the Government, it would seem, would be simply charging for services which it had rendered in passing through the canal vessels bound from the ports of one State to the ports of another State, passing some intermediate points.

The Government has constructed an artificial canal, on which it has spent $400,000,000. In addition to that, it must render actual service in passing the vessels through the locks. Suppose that instead of operating this canal the Government had concluded to continue to operate a railroad across the Isthmus, to take goods brought by vessels from New York upon the Atlantic side and transship them across the Isthmus to vessels upon the other side. Would the Senator claim that that would be a preference, by a regulation of commerce or revenue, of the ports of one State over those of another?

Mr. WORKS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It would be?

Mr. WORKS. It would be, where the railroad is merely a link between navigable waters, as the canal is now.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then, under that theory, the Senator thinks the Government of the United States could not construct a railroad across the Isthmus of Panama unless it should carry free across the Isthmus all goods bound from ports upon the Atlantic to ports upon the Pacific?

Mr. WORKS. The Senator is perfectly right in his position that the Government would have the right to charge tolls for the services rendered in passing through the canal, if that were the policy of the Government as to all navigable streams or other modes of communication controlled by the Government; but the trouble about it is that the Government is discriminating—it is preferring one section of the country to another, in other words, using the terms of the Constitution—by rendering these services free upon other canals and charging tolls for passing vessels through the Panama Canal. There is no difference between the two.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It would be doing the same thing if it had constructed a railroad.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. WEST. I should like to ask a question. We had pending here the other day a measure providing for the construction of a railroad in Alaska, and appropriating $35,000,000 for that purpose. Would the Government, because it allows free passage upon its rivers, where it has spent so much money, be required to allow free passage over this railroad to be constructed in Alaska?

Mr. WORKS. Well, I do not know, Mr. President. I have not gotten as far away as Alaska. We are dealing with quite a different proposition here.

I wish to call attention to another statement of the Supreme Court. Unfortunately, this precise question has not been presented to the Supreme Court, and it has not been determined. We can only gather the reason upon which the court deals with questions of a similar kind.

Here is the case of Crandall v. The State of Nevada (6 Wall., 35). The State of Nevada levied a special tax on railroad and stage companies for every passenger carried out of the State by them. The question involved in this case was whether this was in violation of the Constitution of the United States. Mr. Justice Miller, who delivered the opinion, stated the question as follows:

The question for the first time presented to the court by this record is one of importance. The proposition to be considered is the right of a State to levy a tax upon persons residing in the State who may wish to get out of it, and upon persons not residing in it who may have occasion to pass through it.

The cases bearing upon the question are very carefully considered, and the court concludes that this action of the State was unconstitutional. In the course of the opinion it is said:

It will be observed that it was not the extent of the tax in that case which was complained of, but the right to levy any tax of that character. So in the case before us it may be said that a tax of $1 for passing through the State of Nevada, by stage coach or by railroad, can not sensibly affect any function of the Government or deprive a citizen of any valuable right. But if the State can tax a railroad passenger $1, it can tax him $1,000. If one State can do this, so can every other State. And thus one or more States covering the only practicable routes of travel from the East to the West, or from the North to the South, may totally prevent or seriously burden all transportation of passengers from one part of the country to the other.

The following language is quoted from the opinion of the Chief Justice in what are known as the Passenger cases (7 How., 283):

Living as we do under a common Government, charged with the great concerns of the whole Union, every citizen of the United States from the most remote States or Territories is entitled to free access not only to the principal departments established at Washington but also to its judicial tribunals and public offices in every State in the Union. * * * For all the great purposes for which the Federal Government was formed we are one people, with one common country. We are all citizens of the United States, and as members of the same community must have the right to pass and repass through every part of it without interruption, as freely as in our own States. And a tax imposed by a State for entering its territories or harbors is inconsistent with the rights which belong to citizens of other States as members of the Union, and with the objects which that Union was intended to attain. Such a power in the States could produce nothing but discord and mutual irritation, and they very clearly do not possess it.

This case, of course, involved the obstruction of free passage through the States; but the same principle applies, under the Constitution, to obstructions that create a preference as between the ports of different States.

Let us look at the effect of it for a moment. The Government has spent millions of dollars in making, improving, and maintaining harbors on the Pacific coast. Seattle may ship its goods to Oregon or to California and use all of the harbors upon the coast that have cost, as I say, millions of dollars, without any tax being imposed upon it. San Diego may do the same thing in shipping her goods north. Suppose, however, San Diego wants to ship her goods south through the Panama Canal to New York or to any other State beyond the canal: When she does that she is taxed a dollar and a quarter a ton for goods that are shipped through the canal.

Undoubtedly, as the Senator from Utah says, the Government would have a right to charge for the services it renders in taking these ships through the canal if it were the policy of the Government to do that in all cases; but the well-defined policy of the Government is to grant free of charge the use of all these facilities that it provides at its expense for carrying the commerce of the country; and this is the first case where it is proposed to levy, in effect, a tax upon commerce for passing through one of the canals owned by the Government itself. And this will affect the ports of some of the States, while other ports in the exchange of commerce have the use of the national waterways free of charge.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. GORE. The Government owns the Panama Railway and has been charging freight rates for the transportation of commodities over that highway. Does the Senator think that is a discrimination and therefore a violation of the Constitution?

Mr. WORKS. That would depend altogether upon circumstances; but that is not the case with which I am dealing. It is not a parallel case.

Mr. GORE. If the Senator will permit one other question——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California further yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I should like to have the Senator state some port somewhere which will be shown a preference, if tolls are imposed, as against some other port somewhere else.

Mr. WORKS. I have just stated that, Mr. President. I should suppose the Senator could discover that without any inquiry from me.

Mr. GORE. I have been out of the Chamber for a moment.

Mr. WORKS. I beg the Senator's pardon. I supposed he was doing me the honor to listen to what I had to say.

Mr. GORE. I had been, but I was called out by an urgent request which I could not ignore.

Mr. WORKS. I had just stated the case of San Diego, for example, as compared with some of the other ports, and New Orleans. If she should ship goods in one direction, she would not have to pay a tax. If she should ship them in the other direction, going through the Panama Canal, a tax would be charged. The ports on each side of the canal are discriminated against, because they are compelled to pay a tax for passage through one of the canals of the Government where other ports may ship for thousands of miles without paying any tax at all.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, no port would be discriminated against with reference to the canal itself.

Mr. WORKS. That is not the question.

Mr. GORE. The conditions would be equal.

Mr. WORKS. The conditions are not equal as between different ports of different States in the country. That is the question.

I have here short extracts from one or two other cases dealing indirectly with this question, which I ask to include in my remarks without taking the time of the Senate to read them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that course will be pursued.

The matter referred to is as follows:

MORGAN STEAMSHIP CO. v. LOUISIANA (118 U. S., 455, 467).

There remains to be considered the objection that the law is forbidden by paragraph 6 of section 9 of the first article of the Constitution, which declares that "no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another."

It is not readily perceived how this quarantine statute of Louisiana, and particularly the fees of the quarantine officers, do give such a preference. Are the ports of Louisiana given a preference over ports of other States? Are the ports of any other State given a preference over those of Louisiana? Or are the ports of other States given a preference as among themselves? Nothing of this is pointed out.

The eighth section of this first article of the Constitution is devoted exclusively to defining the powers conferred on Congress.

The ninth section, including the above paragraph, is in like manner devoted to restraints upon the power of Congress and of the National Government, and the tenth section contains only restraints upon the powers of the States by declaring what they shall not do. The most casual inspection shows this, and the clause of the Constitution here relied on is not found among the restrictions of the States, but among those imposed upon the Federal Government. As the matter under discussion is the validity of the statute of Louisiana, it is unaffected by the constitutional provision alluded to.

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA VERSUS THE WHEELING & BELMONT BRIDGE CO. ET AL. (13 HOW., 518).

Mr. WORKS. This was a case where the State of Virginia had authorized the company to construct a bridge across the Ohio River at Wheeling, provision being made to prevent any impairment of navigation of the river. The court held that the bridge was a nuisance, as interfering with navigation. In the course of the opinion, which was delivered by Mr. Justice McLean, it was said:

If the bridge be such an obstruction to the navigation of the Ohio as to change, to any considerable extent, the line of transportation through Pennsylvania to the northern route through New York, or to a more southern route, an injury is done to the State of Pennsylvania, as the principal proprietor of the lines of communication, by canal and railroad, from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh. And this injury is of a character for which an action of law could afford no adequate redress. It is of daily occurrence, and would require numerous if not daily prosecutions for the wrong done, and from the nature of that wrong the compensation could not be measured or ascertained with any degree of precision. The effect would be, if not to reduce the tolls on these lines of transportation, to prevent their increase with the increasing business of the country.

* * * * * * *

The Ohio being a navigable stream, subject to the commercial power of Congress, and over which that power has been exerted, if the river be within the State of Virginia, the commerce upon it which extends to other States is not within its jurisdiction; consequently, if the act of Virginia authorized the structure of the bridge, so as to obstruct navigation, it could afford no justification to the bridge company.

* * * * * * *

It is true the injury done to the State of Pennsylvania may seem to be small when compared to the magnitude of the subject. It applies to all our rivers and affects annually a transportation of many millions of passengers and a commerce worth not less than $600,000,000. It would be as unwise as it is unlawful to fetter in any respect this vast commerce.

I have here a statement from the Treasury Department of expenditures for river and harbor improvements, including canals, from the establishment of the Government to the close of the fiscal year ended June 30, 1913. I ask to be allowed to include that statement in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that will be done.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. WORKS. I will call attention to some particular statements that are contained in this tabulation. It shows that the total rivers and harbors expenditures by States and Territories amount to $364,539,506.27. Our expenditures on the Ohio River, in round numbers, are $28,000,000; on the Mississippi River, $137,000,000; on the Missouri River, $13,000,000. The improvements within the limits of two or more States amount to $93,720,206.90. The total of general and joint improvements is $326,875,447.45. The total expenditures, exclusive of the Panama Canal, are $705,019,693.65, and the expenditures for the Panama Canal are $318,234,574.22.

In other words, over the rivers and harbors, for which we have paid $705,000,000 shipping is allowed to pass free; but in the case of the Panama Canal, which cost us about half that amount, the ports which are compelled to ship through that canal are taxed in the way of tolls. If that is not a preference within the meaning of the Constitution, then I do not understand its language.

I received this morning a telegram containing this very pertinent inquiry:

NORFOLK, VA., April 7, 1914.

Senator WORKS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

America owns her coasts of over 5,000 miles of ocean and Gulf and 40 miles of the Panama Canal. Why allow our ships the right of exclusive coast trading on the 5,000 miles and deny it on the 40 miles of the canal?

E. A. BILISONY.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. President, I come now to consider very briefly the message of the President bearing upon this question. I desire to do it respectfully and with all deference to him and his high office.

I have not agreed with him about some things. I do not in the least agree with him upon this question. I think he deserves to be commiserated, because he has taken upon himself a terrible responsibility. If we surrender our rights and our sovereignty over the Panama Canal, the President of the United States alone will be responsible for that act. Without his influence this bill never would have passed either House of Congress.

It must be a matter of sincere regret to the people of the country that the Chief Magistrate of this great Nation should ask the Congress of the United States to take a serious step like this without giving to the country or even to the Congress, which is asked to pass upon it, a single reason why the step should be taken. It is to me a marvelous condition of things, and naturally it makes me suspect that the President has no valid reasons that would move Congress to repeal this statute against its own judgment. If it were merely a question of losing to our coastwise business, directly or indirectly, the benefits resulting from this exemption, it would be an exceedingly small matter, but it involves much more serious consequences than that.

In the first place it amounts to a confession that goes out to the whole world that the Government of the United States has deliberately attempted to violate a solemn treaty made with a friendly nation. That would be bad enough, but in addition to that it amounts to an abject surrender of the right of this Nation at the demand of another nation. Even worse than that. It surrenders for all time all sovereignty or control over the Panama Canal, which this country has built at such enormous expense. It puts us upon an exactly equal footing with all other nations that observe the rules and regulations laid down in this treaty. We have no rights that they have not. The fact of ownership amounts to nothing. We are simply the agents, with no power of ownership or sovereignty, for the nations of the world which are to use the canal.

Are we willing to make that sacrifice? I have undertaken to show that we are neither morally nor legally bound to make it. Shall we do it voluntarily, without any right or even a demand from another country that we shall make the sacrifice?

In all sincerity I wish we could know what is in the mind of the President. When he comes to the Congress of the United States and asks us to do this thing I should like to know that he is doing it for reasons that would impel us to take a course involving such serious consequences.

The American people never will be satisfied that this sacrifice and surrender shall be made until the President or we can assure the people that we have done it upon sufficient and ample grounds.

What does the President say about it? He says:

I have come to you upon an errand which can be very briefly performed, but I beg that you will not measure its importance by the numbers of sentences in which I state it. No communication I have addressed to the Congress carried with it graver or more far-reaching implications as to the interest of the country, and I come now to speak upon a matter with regard to which I am charged in a peculiar degree by the Constitution itself with personal responsibility.

The President is right when he refers to the importance of the question that he submits for the action of Congress. It involves the good name and the integrity of the Government of the United States in dealing with a foreign nation. Whether that is what he means or not, nobody can tell from the language he uses; but it is the first thing that should present itself to the mind of every American citizen.

I have come to ask you for the repeal of that provision of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from payment of tolls and to urge upon you the justice, the wisdom, and the large policy of such a repeal with the utmost earnestness of which I am capable.

If the President had explained to Congress what he meant by "the justice" of this question, it might have helped us. But he gives us no intimation whatever in his language as to what he deems necessary or right or why we should take this step as an act of justice to any other nation or to ourselves. The wisdom of it, of course, is a matter of opinion. He does not impart to us any wisdom of his own upon the subject.

And the large policy of such a repeal—

There is no doubt about the largeness of it. It is a big question that affects more than dollars and cents. Whether or not the President had in mind that view of it again no one can tell—

In my own judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view, and is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal, concluded on November 18, 1901.

I should like to know when the President, upon mature consideration, determined that this is a mistaken economic policy. He does not tell us. It had not been very many months since the Democratic platform declared in express terms that it was not a mistaken economic policy; and the President not only ran upon that plank of the platform, but he publicly declared in favor of it. So he must have received some light upon the subject between the time he made his speech confirming the declaration in the Democratic platform and the time when this message was delivered.

I should be greatly pleased to know where the information came from that made the President change his mind upon this subject and induced him to repudiate the platform of his own party when he had declared so strongly in its favor and in maintaining it as the declaration of his party.

But I have not come to urge upon you my personal views.

I want to say, Mr. President, that that is just exactly what the President should have urged upon Congress. He assumes, and rightly, too, to suggest and recommend to Congress such legislation as he thinks should be enacted, and he does not do his whole duty with respect to it unless he gives to Congress the reasons for doing it or urges his own personal views on the subject. He has left us totally in the dark, and he has given absolutely no reason why action should be taken. He has disclaimed any intention to urge upon Congress his own personal views on the subject.

I have come to state to you a fact and a situation. Whatever may be our own differences of opinion concerning this much-debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside of the United States.

Mr. President, that is a mistake. If the President has made up his mind in this matter without considering what has been said elsewhere than in the United States, he has not covered the whole ground by any means. Articles were published by able lawyers and distinguished men even in England declaring that we were right in our construction of the treaty. So it is not correct for the President to say that this question is not debated even anywhere else, for it is.

He says:

Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal.

I have shown the Senate that even the Government of Great Britain has made no such interpretation of the treaty as that. On the contrary, while the President of the United States is asserting that nobody is debating this question, but everybody claims that we have no right to exempt our coastwise ships from the payment of tolls, Great Britain herself has admitted that we have a right to make such exemption.

We consented to the treaty; its language we accepted, if we did not originate it; and we are too big, too powerful, too self-respecting a Nation to interpret with a too strained or refined reading the words of our own promises just because we have power enough to give us leave to read them as we please.

Mr. President, that is an insult to the American people. Have we undertaken to give a construction to this treaty that is not justified by its words? Is there a Senator here who voted for this statute who is willing to say that he was attempting at that time, under the oath he had taken, to defraud the Government of England by making a false claim as to the construction that should be placed upon the treaty?

Every single Member of the Senate on the other side of the Chamber voted for this statute and voted against the striking out of that particular clause of it. Are they willing to admit that we acted in bad faith, that we were willing for our own purposes and for gain to place a false construction upon the treaty in our own interests? We consented to the treaty, Mr. President, and we should have the moral courage to carry it out to the letter. If we have made any mistake as to the proper construction of it, we should not hesitate for one moment to surrender that construction; but, sir, if we have conscientiously placed that construction upon it, verified by the vote that was taken in the Senate, and believed we were right in doing so, we should not be asked to surrender the rights of this Nation in the Panama Canal until we have shown by sufficient reasoning that we were mistaken in that action.

How many Senators are there here who believe at this moment that we have placed the wrong construction upon this treaty? Very few, indeed.

The President says further:

The large thing to do is the only thing we can afford to do, a voluntary withdrawal from a position everywhere questioned and misunderstood.

This matter has been very thoroughly discussed between the nations that are directly interested in the treaty. They have discussed this question from all points of view. They had practically reached a conclusion between them, as I insist, as to the construction that ought to be placed upon the treaty.

I am just as well convinced as I am that I am here to-day that if this question had not been reopened by a Member of this body the whole question would have been settled before now, and settled without any feeling of distrust or unfriendliness upon the part of either nation.

Are we misunderstood with respect to it? Have we not made our position perfectly plain from the beginning to the end? Has not the Government of Great Britain considered the position that we have taken and practically admitted that we were right about it, only insisting that the right which was given to our ships might be abused and thereby affect the rights of that country? There never has been a claim or intimation on the part of Great Britain that we were acting in bad faith in insisting on our construction of the treaty, and there is absolutely no reason why the President should cast that imputation upon the people of this country or their Representatives in Congress.

We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and for the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation.

That is a singular statement to make, coupling the surrender of our rights, whether we are right or wrong, with the proposition that we should be generous in carrying out the obligations that we have assumed.

Mr. President, why should we surrender the rights we have under this treaty? What right have we to forfeit the rights of the American people by the action that we may take relating to this question? The President has not told us why. If he had a strong enough reason to justify himself in making this call upon Congress, if he had reason enough to justify the Congress itself in surrendering the rights of the American people under the treaty, the obligation rests upon him to disclose those reasons or at least to give us some reason why he can not disclose them.

I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration.

Now, that is a broad assertion. Does it mean the whole foreign policy of the present administration? Does it involve any continued disagreement between Great Britain and this Nation respecting this particular treaty? Does it relate to the dealings of the Government with Mexico or with South America? Does it interfere with the foreign policy of the administration as a whole or in some particular instance? He does not tell us and nobody knows.

I have tried to think what particular phase of the foreign policy of this Government could be affected in any way, except it might affect our relations with Great Britain alone by any action we might take in dealing with the question that is now before the Senate. Suggestions have been made, intimations have been thrown out, speculation has been rife as to what may be the influence operating upon the mind of the President, but he does not enlighten us, and it is all guesswork and speculation.

I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

That is a moving appeal. It gives evidence of the fact that the President is in trouble; that something in the foreign relations of the country is going wrong; and he calls upon Congress to help him out of his difficulty by surrendering the rights of the people of this country in the Panama Canal.

The newspapers have told us that the President has said in express terms that he did not mean by that clause in his message that there were any complications or troubles in our foreign relations to which he referred. If not, then, whether intentionally or not, he has been misleading us, because anyone reading that clause in his message would at once say that the President is in difficulty in respect of his foreign policy, and that he believes the one way to relieve him from that difficulty is to pass this repeal act.

I have been greatly puzzled to understand how it is possible that any complication in the foreign policy or the foreign affairs of the country could be relieved or affected in any way by the passage of this act except, as I have said, so far as it affects the two parties to the treaty.

Now, let us see, Mr. President, how the Senate stands on this question up to the present time. In the first place, after this question had been fully discussed in the Senate, practically every phase of it affecting the construction of the treaty and our right to pass the statute exempting our ships from the payment of tolls, the Democratic national convention was held, and in one of the planks of the platform this declaration is made:

We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

That was not made as a mere declaration independent of this treaty, because the leaders of the Democratic Party, at least those who were there in that convention and who formulated this plank in the platform in the committee, were perfectly familiar with the whole question of the making of the treaty and the discussion which had taken place upon it.

I should not, for one, maintain that any Senator on the other side of the Chamber is bound by that plank in the platform of his party if he has sufficient reason to believe that the interests of the country demand action upon his part opposed to the declaration of the platform, but I should want to know that he has a sufficient and valid reason for violating the platform of his own political party.

This question of tolls exemption was directly presented to the Senate, and the vote was taken upon it by the motion of the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] to strike out the clause of the bill exempting our coastwise ships from the payment of tolls. What was the vote upon it? Every single Democrat in this body voted against striking it out—every one of them.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. WORKS. The Senator may say that he was absent and I will take that statement, but every single Democratic Senator who was here and was given an opportunity to vote upon it voted for the exemption of tolls. Unfortunately there were Senators on this side of the Chamber who were willing to give the treaty the construction that would deprive us of that right, or who believed that to exempt our ships was bad economic policy.

I assume that Senators on both sides of the Chamber acted in perfect good faith at that time. Nobody had a right to be misinformed about it. It was fully discussed. Everybody understood it or should have understood it.

With that record made by the Democratic Party in this body, the Senators who voted for tolls exemption are now asked to reverse their position on that question and to vote to repeal the exemption. There may be good reasons which are affecting the minds of Democratic Senators who have changed front on this question. Every man, in official life or elsewhere, has the right to change his opinion. If he is an honest man, he will change his opinion and change his vote when he is convinced he was wrong. But have the Senators on the other side of the Chamber been convinced that they were wrong, or are they willing to change their position upon a great question like this simply because somebody else asks them to change it? Are they willing to change their position and their vote upon that question because somebody else, without giving his reasons for it, says that it ought to be done?

I have wondered, Mr. President, that men in whom I have the greatest confidence, and of whose sincerity and honesty of purpose I am assured, should say that simply because the President of the United States has asked them to do so they are willing to vote to repeal this statute. A Senator may be perfectly sincere and honest in his views and say, "I am willing to change my position upon it because the President says it should be done," but I do not understand it; it is beyond my comprehension. I can not believe that any man acting under the solemn obligation of an oath in this body could change his position upon an important matter like this simply because somebody else asked that it be done or said it ought to be done.

Mr. President, in order to make the RECORD complete I should like to insert as a part of my remarks the vote that was taken upon what is known as the Burton amendment to strike out the words "no tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged exclusively in the coastwise trade of the United States," and also the record of the vote that was taken upon the final passage of the bill, which shows that on the single question of the exemption there were 44 for it and 11 against it, all Republicans, and that on the final passage there were 47 yeas, of which 22 were Democrats, and 15 nays, of which 2 were Democrats.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that will be done.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I have said all that I desire to say upon this subject. I entered upon it with the desire and the purpose of discussing as thoroughly as might be the legal phases of the question, keeping out of it as much as possible the political phases of it. The idea of bringing politics into a question of this kind is abhorrent to me. It ought to have no place in a discussion of this kind. It ought not to affect the action of any single Member of this body when we come to a final vote upon this proposition.

During the delivery of Mr. WORKS's speech,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PITTMAN in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 156, relative to expenditures for telegrams sent by Senators.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside until the Senator from California can finish his speech.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no objection to that if it is understood that the unfinished business will then immediately be laid before the Senate and nothing else is to intervene. With that understanding I will not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside. The Senator from California will proceed.

After the conclusion of Mr. WORKS's speech,

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, who has the pending business in charge?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is a unanimous-consent agreement to go into executive session at 4 o'clock. It is now four minutes of 4 o'clock. I will therefore ask to lay aside the unfinished business temporarily, and under that action, if it is taken, the Senator from Oklahoma can go on until the time to go into executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that may be done.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] has cited the authority of Richard Olney, former Secretary of State, in support of his position. It is true that Mr. Olney's private view and personal conviction is that the Government of the United States has the right and the power to exempt our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls without violating our treaty obligations with the Government of Great Britain. But while this is Mr. Olney's private view, while it is his personal conviction, he is also of opinion that the pending repeal bill should be enacted into a law. It is his conviction that Congress should pursue a contrary course to that recommended by the Senator from California.

I ask to have read into the RECORD at this point a letter recently addressed by Mr. Olney to Representative PETERS, and I trust that the authority of former Secretary of State Olney will be as sovereign with the Senator from California when the two disagree as when they agree.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if the letter is not already in the RECORD?

Mr. GORE. It appeared in the House proceedings, but I think it is a fitting sequel and a splendid postscript to the address just delivered by the Senator from California. I ask unanimous consent that it be read.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to its being read. It only shows, of course, that the position of Mr. Olney is in full conformity with the position taken by a good many Senators.

Mr. GORE. That is the reason why I offer it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

BOSTON, March 28, 1914.

Hon. ANDREW J. PETERS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PETERS: I have your favor of the 25th instant asking my views as to how a Representative in Congress should vote on the bill to repeal the free-tolls provision of the Panama Canal act.

If I were in your position, I am very certain I should feel that I ought to stand by the President.

The situation is peculiar. Here is a treaty unquestionably obscure and susceptible of two opposite interpretations, as conclusively shown by the conflicting views of two Presidents of the United States and by the irreconcilable differences of opinion among eminent lawyers without regard to their political affiliations. Recognizing this situation, and though he might have proposed arbitration, the President, in effect, declares that the merits of the issue are immaterial, and that the repeal of the act which raises the issue is absolutely essential to our good standing with the great powers of the world and to the proper conduct of our foreign relations. He makes this declaration as President and as that branch of the National Government especially charged with our foreign relation, and takes the responsibility of assuring Congress and the country that, as compared with the results to be gained by repeal, all other matters involved are of slight account. Now, this declaration of the President must be accepted as made in good faith, with absolute sincerity, and with an intimate knowledge of foreign relations that Congress can not pretend to. What else, therefore, is there to do but follow the President's lead upon a matter upon which he is entitled to lead both by reason of superior acquaintance with the subject and because our frame of government requires him to lead? It must be borne in mind that for Congress not to support such an urgent appeal as the President has made in this instance is not merely to defeat a measure which may be, and which he deems to be, required both by the honor and the well-being of the Nation. It is to discredit him for the future, it is to weaken and prejudice him in his subsequent intercourse with foreign nations, it is to give them notice that he is rather a figurehead than a real factor in the National Government, and that dealings with him are hardly to be regarded as very serious affairs.

Other pertinent considerations leading to the same result might be mentioned, but in the precise situation now confronting Congress they may, I think, be safely passed over because those already given ought to be regarded as decisive.

Very truly, yours,

RICHARD OLNEY.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT (at 4 o'clock p. m.). The Senate of the United States will go into executive session in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement. The Sergeant at Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors.

The Senate thereupon proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 40 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 9, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

REJECTION.

Executive nomination rejected by the Senate April 8, 1914.

CONSUL.

James C. McNally to be consul of the United States of America at Nuremberg, Bavaria.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 8, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, we seek Thee in grateful recognition of the blessings vouchsafed unto us moment by moment, hour by hour, day by day, and we most earnestly pray that Thou wilt continue Thy blessings, that under Thy gracious providence we may move forward to larger life and usefulness as individuals and as a nation; that Thy purposes may be advanced and Thy will be done in us through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I desire to rise to a question of personal privilege. I send to the Clerk's desk, which I ask to be read as the basis of my remarks, a clipping from that splendid newspaper, the Morning News, of Dallas, Tex., containing a dispatch under an Okmulgee, Okla., date line and the caption, and also from Maj. Charles F. Barrett's paper, of Shawnee, Okla.:

MURRAY CONDEMNED.

OKMULGEE, OKLA., March 31.

At a mass meeting held in this city Tuesday night resolutions were adopted condemning WILLIAM H. MURRAY for his opposition to the Panama Canal tolls bill and indorsing President Wilson in his policy. The chairman of the meeting was instructed to wire Senator OWEN, indorsing his attitude, and requesting him to present to MURRAY the censure of local citizens.

The Ada News announced last week that the Hon. W. H. MURRAY had finally made up his mind to run for Congress in this district, and there is every reason to believe that the declaration is official. He may "shoot the bull" in Washington and can the speeches made for home consumption in the oratorical silo known as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but it will take straight and convincing talk out here to win back the former Murray men who quit him in droves when he quit Wilson and aligned himself with the champions of the Shipping Trust and the other host who fell away from him when he attacked Senator GORE and plotted his downfall and took up the cudgels for McMurray and his robber contracts.

* * * * * * *

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LANGLEY. Would it be proper under the rules for me to suggest that the people from New Jersey seem to agree with the gentleman from Oklahoma?

The SPEAKER. No; it would not be proper.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DONOVAN. I rise to ask if this is a question of personal privilege?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, to the charge touching "McMurray and robber contracts" I have to say that this is only a common lie, as all men know.

While speaking of McMurray, I give you specifically my position. I have approved, and I approve now, his work of ridding the rolls of 4,000 fraudulent claims to Indian citizenship and his recovery from the Government pay for the negro land; but I do not approve his so-called "contracts" for fees touching property owned by the Indians, and I told him so before he left here last summer. McMurray has no contracts now, because they have expired by their own limitation. For this reason he went home last year and has not been around Washington since, as everybody knows. I call your attention to his contracts to sell the coal lands, that at the time of making them it was known he had struck a bargain to sell the coal lands for $30,000,000 cash, which sale was revoked then by disapproval of his contract. Now it is admitted that the Indian will never receive one-half that sum. Even if McMurray had received three millions in fees by putting the sale through, the Indians would have yet been better off by $12,000,000. Consider the effect of this as a simple business proposition to them, and to the white people of Oklahoma as well, in the loss and delay in disposing of this property and making it taxable.

"Condemned" for what, Mr. Speaker? For refusing to violate my party platform [applause], for refusing to obey the President's message to us, in which he said: "We ought to reverse our action without raising the question of whether we were right or wrong," condemned for declining to subscribe to the old English principle, "The King can do no wrong." [Applause.]

I am not so obtuse, Mr. Speaker, as to believe that the primary object of this "condemnation" is to affect me. It is but a part of the plan of sending out "canned" editorials to drive Congressmen to reverse their action, to abandon their own convictions, and to violate the platform. These particular Okmulgee "condemners" announce nothing new. These same fellows condemned me when I was elected. Night and day they always condemn me. I shall go to my grave with curses upon their lips. Fair and sensible men will ask for reasons and will await an understanding before they pursue this course, and this is the only class for whom I have any consideration. They know that no amount of condemnation will drive me from any position. I may be convinced by argument and thereby brought to change my position, but I will never be driven from one. Why send this dispatch away down to the Texas papers? It is a notice to the Texas Congressmen that they must stand up on the next demand. It is to serve for future emergency. My constituents know that I violated the wishes of the President by favoring a prohibition of interlocking directorates in the banking act, by amendments to limit the banking board's power, by favoring a guaranty of deposits, by favoring a liberal provision for loans on farm paper, and by my position upon certain tariff schedules.

My opinion of the President is of that high character that I am ready to follow him upon any question that I do not understand or that I am in doubt about, as I followed his desires on the Alaska railroad bill, because I knew nothing of the Alaskan conditions. But upon those things upon which I have convictions by my own method of discovery—and I have never been deceived nor have I ever had cause to regret my position upon any public policy which I have mastered to my own satisfaction, and I know when I have solved a problem—let me give notice now for them to get ready for more condemnation, because if the press of the country correctly speak the views of the President on the bill excluding undesirable foreign immigration, for which I voted upon its passage in this House, I shall vote to pass it over the President's veto [applause]; and when the makeshift rural credit bill is brought before this House, which takes care of the large land-owning farmer, but does not consider the small one or the tenant farmer, who above all others needs aid, I shall again violate the wishes of the President by offering amendments to take care of the tenant farmer.

I desire to read an editorial published in the Daily Oklahoman, the smallest paper with the largest circulation in the State, prior to the consideration of the Panama Canal toll question, which bears all of the earmarks of one of the "canned" editorials sent out from Washington City:

OKLAHOMA IN THE TOLLS FIGHT.

It is gratifying to note that the bulk of the Oklahoma delegation in Congress was with the President. The vote shows the line-up as follows:

With the President—CARTER, DAVENPORT, FERRIS, THOMPSON, and WEAVER.

Against the President—MORGAN, MCGUIRE, and MURRAY.

While the issue involved here is not a political one in any sense, the attitude of Messrs. MORGAN and MCGUIRE, Republicans, is perhaps not difficult to understand. They are "agin" the President on general principles, regardless of right or wrong. They flatter themselves that in doing so they are playing good politics.

But Congressman BILL MURRAY'S opposition is not so easily explained. He perhaps imagines he has not been treated considerately in the matter of patronage, and is known to be strong on spread-eagleism.

I do not care what prompted the votes of Messrs. MORGAN and MCGUIRE. If they voted in order to be in opposition to the President, their vote was wrong. If a Republican were in the White House I would conceive it to be my duty to oppose him only when he was wrong. I am a partisan Democrat in the sense that I believe Democrats should be put into office under a Democratic administration—and in this again I disagree with the President. But I have announced at home and I announce here that I am not a partisan on legislation.

I received a card Monday from a gentleman at Pawnee, Okla., saying, to quote his exact words:

Democracy expects you to sustain the President, right or wrong.

I do not believe this. I believe the Democratic Party expects me to be right and to vote with any occupant of the White House who is right, and, conversely, against him when he is wrong. When my party gets wrong, I have said that it merits defeat and will be defeated. When it is right, it merits success and will be rewarded with success as surely as the people are capable of self-government.

Every atom of my brain, every quivering nerve of my soul is dedicated to my country's weal, even in conflict with my party's harmony and interest. [Applause.]

I represent the State of Oklahoma at large on this floor. A few months ago the State was redistricted, and I intend to become a candidate in our August primaries for election as the first Congressman in the new fourth congressional district, composed of the counties of Johnston, Coal, Pontotoc, Hughes, Pottawatomie, Lincoln, Seminole, Creek, and Okfuskee, and I intend to say to the people of that district that in the organization of the next Congress, irrespective of any opposition or the source of such opposition, I shall cast my vote for Speaker in favor of old CHAMP CARK. [Applause.] Let them make an issue out of that if they will.

The only man at all fit to serve in Congress, or in any other legislative body, is an honest, wise, and brave man—too honest to be bought, too wise to be deceived, too brave to be driven into a compromise of his conscience or mental integrity. [Applause.]

You doubtless have read in ancient history of men who, rewarded for great achievements, made vows to build a great cathedral or some divine edifice. I, too, have made my vow, which until now I have religiously kept. That vow was that if He who guards and guides the destiny of nations and disposes individuals to his uses as instruments to carry out His divine will would permit me the satisfaction to observe written into the constitution of Oklahoma those reforms and sensible rules of progress giving to the farmer and laborer, as well as the merchant and the professional man, equal opportunities under the law—a constitution as broad as the citizenship of the State—that knows no interest but the public interest—that so long as I might remain in public life I would maintain my own mental integrity against the demands of any man, organization, class, prince, or people; that I would maintain greater fear of violating my own mental peace than of defeat for public office.

Independent thought and fearless action of brave, conscientious men alone made possible the just provisions of the Oklahoma constitution. Inspiration by the example of my associates in that body will mark my conduct on this floor. I was commissioned by my constituents to aid their thinking and to do their voting while in Congress, and I shall not abdicate that authority to any other individual or power. My people may retire me at their pleasure, but while here I shall execute religiously their commission. [Applause.]

This same paper in another editorial suggests that doubtless MURRAY'S refusal to vote with the President on the Panama tolls question was due to the fact that MURRAY was not receiving much patronage, and that MURRAY merely felt resentful because of the responsible part he took in landing to the President his 10 first votes from the State of Oklahoma in the Baltimore convention. Patronage! Why, such an argument might sound plausible 1,500 miles away from Washington, but you know that there is no foundation in fact for such a statement here in the Capital. I would not change my position on this question, so important to our national being, for all the patronage in the Republic. I might suffer under the charge "mugwump," but it will not stick to call me a "piewump." [Laughter and applause.]

I am fully convinced that my position on Panama tolls is correct, and that the dangers which the future may bring us by the President's construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is likely to lose us our national control over the canal or else embroil us in future war can now be forestalled by adhering to our former construction.

Nor does this Oklahoma paper tell the whole truth about the vote of the Oklahoma delegation. You remember there was a roll call on the question of adopting the "cloture rule" limiting debate and prohibiting the introduction of amendment to the bill, which kind of rules were condemned in the last campaign by Democrats everywhere, and was the first adopted in this House on any bill. The records show upon that roll call—speaking only of the Democratic Members from Oklahoma—for this rule, CARTER, FERRIS, and WEAVER; against it, MURRAY, DAVENPORT, and THOMPSON. Then a motion was made to recommit the bill, with instructions to put in an amendment reciting that by the repeal of free tolls we did not yield the authority to control the canal, to exempt American ships, or to make such use of it for our Navy or any American Government-owned ship, as experience demonstrated. For this motion the vote stood, MURRAY, DAVENPORT, THOMPSON; against, CARTER, FERRIS, WEAVER. Then the roll was called on the bill, and on this the vote shows—for, CARTER, DAVENPORT, FERRIS, THOMPSON, WEAVER; against, MURRAY. Had the amendment proposed in the motion to recommit gone into the bill, I would have felt like yielding to the President my convictions on the economic question—for, if wrong, it could be corrected in the future—and voting for the bill, but I was unwilling to place a construction on the treaty that would bind us for all the years to come and would either lose us the control over the canal or force us into war in order to regain it.

This argument will fall on barren ears of men unacquainted with the history and the practice in diplomacy and the conduct of nations. It is the most elementary principle of nations, our own included, that a nation has the right and will exercise it to force compliance of treaties when such construction is agreed to by the nation violating them. Hence, when Perry made the treaty with Japan in the fifties and Japan, in 1863, closed her ports, notwithstanding the United States was in the midst of a great civil conflict, she nevertheless sent her Navy and opened the ports of Japan with guns, thereby enforcing obedience to the treaty. Nor is this the only instance. More than a score of times has this Republic invoked naval force to compel nations to obey her treaties. Once we place this construction upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty all the nations of the world will enforce that construction against us, even against our right to use it with our Navy if it takes the force of arms to do it. You know and I know the American people will never lose control over that canal; and if that continues to be their temper, this construction means war sooner or later. I am not afraid of war in a just cause, but it is a crime to bring on a war when it can be avoided. [Applause.] Hence from my viewpoint it was a question of national integrity, a question of patriotism.

However, I do not dispute the right of gentlemen to differ with me. I accord to them that right of difference, and I expect honest, intelligent men to accord that right to me.

I feel the importance of my vote deeply. But once in my whole life did I feel convictions over a public question so great as this, and that exception was when I declined in 1907 to accept the advice of seven lawyers selected by the constitutional convention to advise me by calling an election to ratify the constitution of the State, and that in violation of a Federal court injunction issued against me by the Supreme Court of the Territory of Oklahoma. For this I was condemned by the press, by the politicians, and in mass meeting by many good people. Within 6 miles of my home such a meeting was called and condemned me, but my duty was so clear to me then that no power on earth or in hell would have changed me. In less than 90 days all agreed that my position was the only safe one possible to have been taken.

It was during these trying difficulties that I fully comprehended, as I so comprehend now, the philosophy which I had not the words to express, but in after years I read in Kipling's "If":

If you can keep your head when all about you
Are losing theirs and blaming it on you;
If you can trust yourself when all men doubt you,
But make allowance for their doubting, too.

If you can wait and not be tired by waiting,
Or, being lied about, don't deal in lies,
Or, being hated, don't give way to hating,
And yet don't look too good nor talk too wise.

Nor is this the only instance since my public career began that I have met condemnation by some organized, misguided body of men, when time proved I was right, but I feel just as deeply the rectitude of my position in this vote. My convictions were such that to have done otherwise would have compelled me to stab my own conscience, to club my own brain, and to write across my brow the word "idiot." [Applause.]

Whatever this vote may mean to me, I have been true to myself, and in this I have but to invoke the injunction of Shakespeare:

This above all: To thine own self be true,
And it must follow, as the night the day,
Thou canst not then be false to any man.

I fear neither opposition, condemnation, nor defeat. I fear but to be wrong. Neither is it important that I hold public office, but it is important that I preserve my self-respect.

When I retire to private life I shall carry with me that calm consolation of a man at peace with his own mind and conscience.

In my effort to maintain the things I have worked for, to sustain the truth I have talked for, I shall muster the courage to approach as nearly as frail humanity will permit me the other inspiring lines of Kipling's "If":

If you can bear to hear the truth you have spoken
Twisted by knaves to make a trap for fools,
Or watch the things you gave your life to, broken
And stoop and build them up with worn-out tools.

If you can force your heart and nerve and sinew
To serve your turn long after they are gone,
And so hold on when there is nothing in you
Except the Will which says to them: "Hold on!"

[Applause.]

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Speaker, on the 2d of March the bill (H. R. 14128) granting permission to Lieut. Col. John P. Finley to accept and wear a decoration presented by the Sultan of Turkey, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I understand under the practice that this bill should have been referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I have conferred with the chairmen of both committees, and they are willing that the reference should be changed to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs from the further consideration of a bill and refer it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I could not hear what the gentleman said about the bill.

Mr. DOREMUS. The bill grants permission to Lieut. Col. Finley, of the United States Army, to wear a decoration presented to him by the Sultan of Turkey.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 474) to authorize the issuance of absolute and unqualified patents to public lands in certain cases.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 4544. An act to reserve certain lands and to incorporate the same and make them a part of the Caribou National Forest Reserve.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 1739) to reserve certain lands and to incorporate the same and make them a part of the Caribou National Forest Reserve.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 12235) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, and for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, had agreed to the conference asked for by the House, and had appointed Mr. BRYAN, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, and Mr. PERKINS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the Committee on Claims.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I have understood that the rule had been considered and construed up to this time that the Committee on Claims was not entitled to be called on Calendar Wednesday, it having a day under the rule. If the Chair holds that the Committee on Claims should be called on Calendar Wednesday, I am ready to proceed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Claims is called on this day for public bills on the House Calendar, and not for bills on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is correct. Has the gentleman from North Carolina any general bill from the Committee on Claims?

Mr. POU. The committee has no general bill, Mr. Speaker, that I am aware of.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will continue the call.

The Clerk continued the call. When the Committee on Revision of the Laws was called,

ALLEGATION AND PROOF OF LOYALTY IN CERTAIN CASES.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Revision of the Laws to call up the bill H. R. 5850.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5850) to amend section 162 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. BARTLETT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5850, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 162 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 162. The Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction of any claim therefor filed within two years from the date of the passage of this bill, of those whose property was taken subsequent to June 1, 1865, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 12, 1863, entitled 'An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States,' and acts amendatory thereof, where the property so taken was sold and the net proceeds thereof were placed in the Treasury of the United States; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall return said net proceeds to the owners thereof, on the judgment of said court, and full jurisdiction is given to said court to adjudge said claims, any statutes of limitations to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That no allegation or proof of loyalty shall be required in the presentation or adjudication of such claims."

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, this bill comes before the House with a unanimous report from the Committee on Revision of the Laws. While there was considerable controversy over the bill at the time it was considered in a former Congress, as it was passed by an overwhelming majority and went to the Senate, and was favorably reported by the Senate committee, but failed to pass the Senate only because it was not called regularly on the calendar for passage, I do not think there will be any necessity for taking up a great deal of time on this proposition, at least I trust not. It is so clear-cut, so precise, and so reasonable and just that I can not conceive there will be any great opposition to its passage by this body at this time.

The only proposition involved in this bill is whether the people to whom there is credit for property that was taken by the authorities of the United States after the Civil War was over, proceeds of property sold, when they come before the Court of Claims they shall be required to allege and prove that they were at all times loyal to the United States.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE. Are these claims what are commonly known as cotton claims?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; they are the same claims which we considered and about which I endeavored to enlighten the gentleman during the last Congress. It is the bill which passed this House by a very large majority.

Mr. MOORE. And this bill gives the claimants the privilege of bringing their cases before the Court of Claims without regard to proof of loyalty?

Mr. WATKINS. It does.

Mr. MOORE. That would waive the question that has interfered with their right to make claims heretofore?

Mr. WATKINS. The only question as to their right; yes.

Mr. MOORE. Can the gentleman indicate how large these claims will be in the aggregate?

Mr. WATKINS. They amount to four million eight hundred and eight-six thousand and odd dollars.

Mr. MOORE. That would cover the entire volume of claims likely to be presented if this act should pass?

Mr. WATKINS. This bill provides that only those claims shall be paid where the money is actually in the Treasury, and there is less than $5,000,000 in the Treasury. Therefore no more than that could be paid out.

Mr. MOORE. It has been stated heretofore that these claims will amount in the aggregate to probably $50,000,000. Is any such amount understood to be involved?

Mr. WATKINS. If all of the claims for all of the property which was taken under the act of 1863 were asserted and were now before Congress, in the aggregate they would amount to over $26,000,000, but that amount has been paid out from time to time, until it has been reduced to within less than $5,000,000. I have a report from the Secretary of the Treasury to show the exact number of dollars and cents now in the Treasury which can be reached by this bill, and only that amount can be reached, because the bill provides that only that amount which actually remains in the Treasury to the credit of these persons whose names are designated can be recovered.

Mr. MOORE. Then, the gentleman is warranted in stating that the Government would not be expected to pay more than $5,000,000 in the aggregate, if this bill should pass and all these claims should be allowed by the Court of Claims?

Mr. WATKINS. The Government could not possibly pay more under this law, which restricts the payment to the amount actually in the Treasury. There is less than $5,000,000 in the Treasury.

Mr. MOORE. The $26,000,000 to which the gentleman refers is not in the Treasury now?

Mr. WATKINS. No; that has been paid out until it is within less than $5,000,000.

Mr. MOORE. Then that amount would be the very outside that these claims would amount to, if the bill shall be passed and the claims be allowed by the Court of Claims?

Mr. WATKINS. That is correct.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I have just read this bill and I have listened to previous discussions upon it. As I understand it, these were cases where property was taken during the Civil War by the Government, the property sold, and the money placed in the Treasury. This is a bill to give the Court of Claims jurisdiction, so that those who lost that property may recover the sums covered into the Treasury. Is that correct?

Mr. WATKINS. The gentleman's statement is correct with one exception. It is not property taken during the Civil War, but is property which was taken after June 1, 1865—after the cessation of hostilities.

Mr. MURDOCK. How much in the aggregate did that property amount to?

Mr. WATKINS. Something over $26,000,000, to begin with; but that amount has been reduced by payments to less than $5,000,000.

Mr. MURDOCK. How was that reduction accomplished?

Mr. WATKINS. Partly on account of charges made against the property for capturing it, for transporting it, for selling it, and converting the proceeds into the Treasury, and the other amounts paid to claimants who took their claims into the Court of Claims within the time stated by the statute.

Mr. MURDOCK. There is reference in this bill to a statute of limitations, which is waived. What was that statute?

Mr. WATKINS. The statute originally was for two years and another statute was passed extending that for two years, after the limitation had expired. A large number of claims were filed by those who were not aware that they had to assert their claims during the continuation of the statute.

Mr. MURDOCK. And this provision lets them in?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes. There is no controversy now, because the law enacted in the revision of the code, adopted and approved on the 3d of March, 1911, taking effect January 1, 1912, provides that there shall be no statute of limitations to bar those claims, that being section 162 of the codification of laws.

Mr. Chairman, as this proposition seems to be not fully understood, it will perhaps be better for me to go hastily over the history of the legislation in reference to these claims. On the 3d of March, 1911, this codification of the laws under the judiciary titles, coming from the Committee on Revision of the Laws, of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Judge Moon, was the chairman, adopted section 162, which provides:

> The Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the claims of those whose property was taken subsequent to June 1, 1865, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 12, 1863, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States," and acts amendatory thereof where the property so taken was sold and the net proceeds thereof were placed in the Treasury of the United States; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall return said net proceeds to the owners thereof on the judgment of said court; and full jurisdiction is given to said court to adjudge said claims, any statutes of limitations to the contrary notwithstanding.

The primary object of having that section inserted in this law was to obviate the statute of limitation which had been up to that time two years.

The first act of 1863 limiting the right to two years in which the right to assert a claim in the Court of Claims was once extended two years. After this section 162 had been adopted, incorporated in the judicial code, these cases then which had been lying dormant for a great number of years before the Court of Claims, not having asserted their right within the two years—these claims were revived and there was an effort made to have them considered by the Court of Claims. An exception was filed by the attorney representing the United States Government, and that motion to dismiss or exception was directed to sections 159 and 160 of this codification. These sections 159 and 160 provided that no claim can be asserted in the Court of Claims by any persons unless they first allege and finally prove they were loyal at all times to the Union cause or the United States Government during the Civil War. Those two sections, 159 and 160, are not on the same subject matter nor relate to the same law to which section 162 relates; that is, the primary law, the original law from which these sections were incorporated or from which they were gathered and by virtue of which they were incorporated in this revision of the laws, was taken from laws on different subject matters entirely, and this revision is simply a compilation of the statutes. It is not a single isolated or solitary law on any subject matter.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman from Louisiana yield?

Mr. WATKINS. I will.

Mr. CAMPBELL. In this compilation the gentleman omits the statute which requires the allegation of loyalty and proof of loyalty before the claim would be maintained.

Mr. WATKINS. Yes, sir; and while I am on that proposition I might as well call the attention of the gentleman from Kansas to the fact that there are repeated decisions, the primary one and the one most frequently quoted is the case of Klein against The United States, in which it was held and so construed by all lawyers of my acquaintance, at least with whom I have conferred on this subject both in the city of Washington and in other places, that it was not necessary to allege and prove loyalty on account of the amnesty which had been granted to those parties by the proclamation of the President of the United States. It was announced in the opinion of Klein against The United States that it was unnecessary, in view of the proclamation granting amnesty and pardon to all parties, that they did not have to allege and prove loyalty, and for this reason this question of loyalty was not incorporated in section 162.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The court held that under the old law, which is left out of this bill?

Mr. WATKINS. The original act of Congress, passed in 1863, provided, first, that all parties asserting their rights to these proceeds arising from the sale of this property should first bring their case within two years; and, second, an absolute requirement was that they should allege and prove loyalty in all those cases. The proclamation of the President of the United States granted amnesty to all those parties who had participated in the Rebellion, as did various proclamations issued by the President of the United States. In the case of Klein against The United States the Supreme Court of the United States held that since that proclamation it was unnecessary to allege and prove loyalty by those parties, and on that account the provision was not incorporated in section 162 of the codification of the laws; but it dispensed with the time of two years' limit, and it dispensed with the necessity of alleging and proving loyalty, because the committee had that question under consideration and did not consider at that time that it was necessary to put into the statute and enact a law which had been declared by the Supreme Court of the United States to be inoperative against those parties at that time.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Was the President authorized to make proclamation waiving this statute?

Mr. WATKINS. Why, the President of the United States was authorized to grant pardon and amnesty to all those parties participating in the rebellion, and he did so. There were numerous proclamations, which are unnecessary to give, granting complete amnesty to all parties who participated in the Civil War, except to one individual. In the case of the United States against Klein the Supreme Court of the United States went so far as to say that although there should be and had been an act of Congress passed requiring this proof of loyalty, that this amnesty granted to these parties had relieved them and dispensed with the necessity of alleging and proving loyalty.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman advise me whether proof of disloyalty will continue to operate as a bar to recovery if this act is passed?

Mr. WATKINS. If any persons assert their claims in the Court of Claims, if this law is passed and it is proved absolutely that the parties who had asserted their claims in the Court of Claims participated in the War of the Rebellion on the part of the South and were disloyal, still they could assert their claims and recover.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Not with the law you are now proposing?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes. I will explain it to the gentleman. They can do it under the law as it is now. Our dread of what the present interpretation of this law will be is not why we bring this case before the Congress——

Mr. CAMPBELL. Let me ask, if the law is as now stated by the gentleman, why is it necessary to make this modification?

Mr. WATKINS. I will explain that fully. Our interpretation of the Kline case and other decisions on the same line at the time that this section was incorporated in the revision of the laws, was that it was unnecessary to allege and prove loyalty as interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States. But when it came to test these cases and try them in the Court of Claims the attorney of the United States Government set up as an obstacle in the way an exception and moved to dismiss the cases because of the fact that we had not alleged and proved loyalty, and he claimed that these sections 159 and 160 of the Codification of the Revision of the Laws did require at this time allegation and proof of loyalty. That case has been decided by the Court of Claims, and the Court of Claims has gone into the most minute detail in an exhaustive opinion, reviewing all the decisions of the Supreme Court on this question and on these questions involved in these several sections of the codification the Court of Claims has decided, and correctly so, that it was not necessary to allege and prove loyalty in these cases now pending, because these two sections—159 and 160—were not law on the same subject matter that section 162 was upon; that they were not derived from the same source; that they were entirely separate and distinct legal propositions, and this was simply and purely a codification of the law enacting various statutes and compiling and revising them, and they were separate and distinct propositions and did not depend one on the other.

The court has decided that. But although that is a decision of the Court of Claims, there are large numbers of these claims which are owned by people who are not only old and decrepit themselves, and who are dying off continually, but the witnesses are constantly dying and getting out of the way, and by the time the decision of the Court of Claims goes to the Supreme Court of the United States it is estimated it will take about three years. That is to proceed with the trial on the merits of these cases and get them transferred on appeal and passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States, and in that length of time a large number of the witnesses who are now available will have died off and their evidence can not be procured.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What is the aggregate of these claims now, if the gentleman knows?

Mr. WATKINS. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in Senate Document No. 23, Forty-third Congress shows that. I have answered that question once, but I will answer it again more explicitly, so that there can be no misunderstanding. It is Executive Document No. 23, Forty-third Congress, second session, and contains the report of the Acting Secretary of the Treasury. You will find in that report, on page 58——

Mr. CAMPBELL. What is the date of the report?

Mr. WATKINS. The date of it? It is in response to a Senate resolution passed on December 18, 1873, and the date of his report is February 1, 1875; 1873 and 1875 are the dates intervening from the time the report was made until this compilation of the claims was made by the Secretary of the Treasury and submitted to Congress in reply to the resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Had the gentleman from Louisiana thought of publishing that in connection with his remarks? I take it that that document is not now available?

Mr. WATKINS. I will incorporate my statement. Yes, sir; it has been reprinted. But it is quite lengthy, and I should dislike very much to encumber the RECORD with it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Can the statement of the claims be included without inconvenience?

Mr. WATKINS. Now, if the gentleman from Kansas will indulge me a moment or two, as that question has been raised twice during this discussion, I would like to call his attention to the fact that the exact number of dollars involved is $4,886,671, the exact amount now remaining in the Treasury, and that amount is credited to the parties whose names and residences are given. That amount is credited to the parties, with the weights of cotton originally taken, by what Government agent it was taken, where and to whom it was sold, and transportation charges and all other charges connected with it, and shows the net balance after all the payments have been made out of it.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. WATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman mean all of the balance that remains in the Treasury out of the cotton claims is less than $5,000,000, or the amount affected by this bill?

Mr. WATKINS. The amount affected by this bill is what I mean, because those are the amounts of the proceeds of cotton taken after June 1, 1865.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know how much remains in the Treasury of the proceeds of cotton sales entire?

Mr. WATKINS. No, sir. I have not made any inquiry as to that, because the only thing we expected to do was to get back the proceeds of that property after the proceeds were in the Treasury, which were derived from the sale of the property taken after the war was over.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman state how many claims there are which will be affected by this bill?

Mr. WATKINS. There is a volume of them here. It gives the number. They are placed by States and subdivisions of States. I have not added them up to see exactly how many there are.

Mr. MOORE. Will there be 100 or 200?

Mr. WATKINS. I will say there will be in the neighborhood of 500 or 600. Of course, I am guessing about it. The list is here. I am governed largely by the number of pages in that book and the number of names on a page.

Mr. MOORE. How many States would be concerned?

Mr. WATKINS. The proceeds of this property now, if distributed, would be distributed in nearly all the States, but largely in the 13 Southern States.

Mr. MURDOCK. Are these claims negotiable? Are they passed from hand to hand, as is sometimes the case?

Mr. WATKINS. As far as I know, they are not. I know of no legal reason why they could not be transferred as any other open account or obligation.

Mr. MURDOCK. A great many of the original claimants must be dead now, are they not?

Mr. WATKINS. A majority of them are dead, I should say, from my knowledge of those in the section of country in which I live, but their children and grandchildren are there.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman know whether a considerable number of these claims have been bought up by other parties and are now in the hands of any one man or set of men?

Mr. WATKINS. I do not have in mind any claims where they have been treated in that way, although there are many cases where people are or have been in destitute circumstances, where they would be willing to transfer their right for a consideration, in order to eke out a miserable existence, as was the case just after the war.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman knows that a few years ago a bill similar to this was up, and I remember hearing the statement made after the passage of the bill that the claims had accumulated in the hands of some bankers; that they had been bought up, and that really the people whom we had sought to benefit by the payment of the claims were not benefited at all.

Mr. WATKINS. I remember a statement of that kind in regard to some claims that were brought in here in connection with a war claims bill. I remember that was stated in the argument. I do not know of any instance of that in this case, although in all probability there may be a number of them.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman will concede that that was the case with respect to the French spoliation claims?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes. It is perfectly natural in a vast number of claims that some of the claims in many instances would be transferred, particularly if they were old.

Mr. MURDOCK. But the gentleman does not know whether in this case there has been a large accumulation of claims in the hands of any individual?

Mr. WATKINS. I do not know where that has been done; but I do know a large number of the claimants in the congressional district which I have the honor to represent and in the adjoining district, and I know some of the attorneys who mutually represent the claimants in the different sections, and I know that as a rule the original heirs and their descendants have asserted their claims in the courts, and that the claims now stand in the names of the original claimants.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE. In the case of the French spoliation claims parties had paid a consideration to the persons who actually needed the money and who were the original claimants. Does the gentleman see any reason why those who had advanced money to the original claimants should not be subrogated to the rights of the original claimants?

Mr. WATKINS. In the cases to which the gentleman refers some of those people were imposed upon, and the claims were gotten for a ridiculously low price, without any adequate consideration, and the imposition was such and the value of the claims was such that many of the Members of Congress voted against the claims on that ground.

Mr. MOORE. I will say to the gentleman, and I hope he will take satisfaction from this fact, if it is a satisfaction to him, that there are a number of French spoliation claims that have been pending for generations, where the actual money was paid by assignees to the original claimants, some of whom are still knocking at the doors of Congress, asking to be paid what is honestly due them. I will say to the gentleman, if he has cases of that kind and they are properly proven before the court, as I understand they must be under this bill, there is no earthly reason why the Government of the United States should not pay. Debts that are honestly due ought to be paid. It ought to be so in the case of the French spoliation claims, and if it is proved in the court that there has been no speculation and no Shylocking business, as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] suggests, these claims ought to be paid. Justice should be done, whether to the assignee, who has paid the lawful claimant, or to the heir of a lawful claimant. People to whom money is due should not be compelled to go on their hands and knees for generations seeking justice at the hands of the Government.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman says he has a document there that shows the claimants and the amount due each claimant, and so on. I am desirous of knowing just from what source that document was prepared. Is it founded on the records in the Treasury Department?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes. It was made by the Treasury Department in response to a resolution of the Senate of the United States asking for information on the subject.

Mr. HARRISON. When was that filed?

Mr. WATKINS. The resolution originated in the Senate on December 18, 1873, and the reply was made by the Secretary of the Treasury on February 1, 1875. The delay was caused, they claim, by the vast number of claims which were then before them for consideration and investigation, and on account of the confusion of accounts they were delayed in making the report.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the gentleman whether in making up this data the Government went merely to its records, or did it go out and get testimony from witnesses, so as to enable the Government to prove up the claims and get intelligent information from witnesses concerning them?

Mr. WATKINS. It is inferred that in getting up the data they depended upon the memoranda to which they had access there in the archives of the Treasury or in the various places where the sales had been made by the agents and reports had been made. But primarily, if not entirely, the data was made up from memoranda in the Treasury itself.

Mr. HARRISON. One more question, and then I am through. If a party in my district or in any other district thinks he has a claim against the Government, and his claim is not embodied in this particular list, will he have any right to recover on his claim by this bill?

Mr. WATKINS. The list not only furnishes the names, but the amounts in the Treasury to be paid out. This bill is not confined to names, but to amounts.

Mr. HARRISON. It is not confined to the names in that document?

Mr. WATKINS. No; because there are a great many on that list who can not recover, and those who could not recover might leave an excess, and if there is any excess left in the Treasury, that excess is paid to those who are not on the list and who are entitled to receive payment.

Mr. HARRISON. Could the gentleman tell what percentage that might be?

Mr. WATKINS. No; I have no idea.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. Along that same line, is it true that the officers who seized this cotton followed the practice of giving a certificate to those from whom the cotton was received and furnished to the department here at the time a record, and it was from those records that this list is made up? Is it not a fact that at the time this property was taken the officers issued certificates to the owners from whom the property was received, and made reports to the Treasury Department at the time, so that the Treasury Department, in making up this list, made it from the public records and got the names of the owners?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WINGO. And under the law as it now stands, and which will not be amended by this act if this act should become a law, the owners of the proceeds could simply prove their ownership in the Court of Claims, and there is nothing in this bill or the pending law that would limit the right to recover to those only whose names happened to appear upon the report made in 1875?

Mr. WATKINS. No, sir.

Mr. WINGO. The owners may still go into the Court of Claims under this law, and the only change is to meet the proposition of loyalty.

Mr. WATKINS. That is the only isolated proposition in this bill. But to give a conclusive answer, I will read the law under which these claims originated; in other words, the law which granted to the Government the right to go into the Southern States and take property which was considered as abandoned and convert it into proceeds. That will answer all the questions which have been asked.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman state the date of that?

Mr. WATKINS. That was approved March 12, 1863. It is hardly necessary to read the entire law, which I have before me, and I will not incumber the RECORD with it; but it states these propositions——

Mr. HARRISON. What is the title of the act?

Mr. WATKINS. An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States. It contains this proviso:

Provided, That such property shall not include any kind or description which has been used, or which was intended to be used, for waging or carrying on war against the United States, such as arms, ordnance, ships, steamboats, or other water craft, and the furniture, forage, military supplies, or munitions of war.

The fact is that those articles being enumerated as not coming within the property which was supposed to be abandoned shows that this class of property which we now have under consideration, to wit, cotton, which was taken after the war had closed, and which is the only property I know of that was taken in any substantial quantity after the war closed, does not come within the excluded list; that is, these articles of warfare do not come under the captured and abandoned property act. That emphasizes the fact that these sections of the law—159 and 160—are not on the same subject matter, because they are sections growing out of the law passed during the Civil War, which provided for the capture of accouterments of war; that is, provided for the capture of the particular class of property which is exempted from this act.

The gentleman who asked the question is not now present, and so it is hardly necessary for me to read the answer from the law, so I will condense it and state it briefly. It provides that a Government agent shall go into what they call the insurrectionary districts, take there the property which has been abandoned, convert that property into proceeds by selling it, and keep an itemized statement containing a description of the property, the time when it was taken, the person from whom it was taken, transport it and pay the transportation charges for conveying it to market, convert it into proceeds in the market, and cover the proceeds back into the Treasury of the United States. It provides also that all parties from whom this property has been taken may have the right within two years to claim the proceeds of the property, provided they were loyal to the Government at the time the property was taken.

Afterwards, on July 2, 1864, the law was somewhat changed, but it is not material to the discussion of this question, because the question of loyalty was not involved there at all. Many decisions were delivered and published by the Supreme Court and cases were tried by the Court of Claims in the interim intervening between the time limits and 1911, and all those cases where the question came up straight before the Supreme Court or, so far as I know, even before the Court of Claims, were after the amnesty proclamation of the President was published and promulgated. In all those cases the decision of the court was to the effect—and in the Klein case it was in direct words—that the allegation and proof of loyalty was unnecessary.

Now, that is a broad statement, a statement which will be challenged particularly by the gentleman, if he participates in this discussion, who quoted the decision announced in the Haycraft case at the time this question was considered on a former occasion. But in the case of the United States against Haycraft the proposition of loyalty is not involved at all. On every page of the decision the statement is made that two years having intervened from the time the property was taken up to the time that the claim was filed it is too late for the claimants to assert their claims. The Supreme Court in that case held that there were two propositions as a basis for the assertion of these claims. The first was that it must be done within two years, and the second was that the party must allege and prove loyalty, and that the two years was not a statute of limitations. That is the proposition submitted and the question decided in the Haycraft case, that the two years was not a statute of limitations, but that it was a question of jurisdiction. The court had no jurisdiction to try the case unless it was brought into the court within two years, and it was on that question, and that alone, that the Supreme Court of the United States based its opinion in the Haycraft case, which was held up here at the last consideration of this question as an obstacle in the way of removing the necessity for alleging loyalty. It does not touch on the question of loyalty at all, except to affirm to all intents and purposes the decision in the Klein case, which did say it was not necessary to allege and prove loyalty.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, are the claims to which the gentleman has referred all of them for cotton taken as he has described, or are any of them for the destruction of property incident to a state of war?

Mr. WATKINS. No property destroyed is covered in this act. It is only that property which was taken after the war was over—after June, 1865—converted into proceeds, and the proceeds placed in the Treasury of the United States, subject to the claim of those who asserted their claims within two years and who alleged and proved loyalty.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman states that all the claims affected by this act are of that character?

Mr. WATKINS. As far as I know; and I have made exhaustive search to find out whether there was any other class of claims.

Mr. CAMPBELL. And it relates to cotton, taken as the gentleman has described?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; and cotton was not denominated in the act of 1863 as contraband. That act under which we are operating now excluded or eliminated cotton in denominating equipment, accouterments, instruments of war, and was not considered a contraband of war, so far as the act of 1863 is concerned.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Can the chairman explain why it was that this property was taken by the Federal Government?

Mr. WATKINS. Because the act of 1863, to which I refer, gave authority to agents of the Government to go into this insurrectionary district and take charge of all property which was lost or abandoned. That law was in operation on the statute book after the war, and these agents were drawing salaries, and some of them large salaries. The agents were permitted to continue their operations until ordered out of the field.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Was it deemed that this property was lost or abandoned?

Mr. WATKINS. A large quantity was in the ginhouses and at steamboat landings ready for shipment up and down the rivers for the purpose of taking it to market, but not in actual charge of any person who had control over it. However, the agents in some cases, following their instructions, would take charge of the property anyway, whether anybody claimed to have charge of it or not, and in some instances they sold large quantities of cotton and only accounted for a small sum.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. The fact was that the Federal Government had gained complete control of this territory where the cotton was found, and the conditions were very demoralized at that time in these localities, so far as the real owners of the property was concerned. That was the condition, was it?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Was it formally confiscated by the Government?

Mr. WATKINS. This was not property that was subject to confiscation. The statute provided that it should not be confiscated by the Government, that it was to be sold, and that the proceeds were to be put into the Treasury subject to the claim of the owners. Confiscated property is taken over for the use of the Government, as the proceeds are not placed in the Treasury for the benefit of the former owners. In the case of Kline against the United States the Supreme Court held that this was a trust fund; that this property was taken for the benefit of those who had been the former owners, who had been driven away from it and abandoned it. It was purely a trust fund.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. That is just what I was trying to reach. I wanted to know whether that was the reason that the Government took it. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WATKINS. The original law did not allow them to take the property for governmental purposes and no subsequent law has ever been passed to allow them to do it, and that is the reason the proceeds have been lying dormant for nearly 50 years and no interest allowed to the parties.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. I will.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman say whether the owners were known to the Government in any instance?

Mr. WATKINS. In almost every instance. In the report you will find that receipts were given to the parties, and that they have the names of the parties and their residences.

Mr. MOORE. The Government agents actually gave receipts for the property?

Mr. WATKINS. Where the owners were found and known.

Mr. MOORE. When it comes to proving up the claims, there will be receipts showing who the original owner was?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; nearly all the receipts are filed in the Treasury Department. There may be a few instances where the parties have the original receipts or they have been lost or destroyed.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. Is it not true that to carry out the original act of 1863 it is necessary to have legislation of this kind? The original act of 1863 was predicated on the idea that in the Southern States there was considerable property that was not in the direct control of the owners, but was abandoned. Agents were appointed under the act to collect this abandoned property, save it, sell it under terms or rules prescribed, and cover the proceeds into the Treasury, to be held for the rightful owners to prove up their claims. In other words, it was not contended that they seized it as an incident of war, but the act proceeds upon the ground that it was abandoned property.

Mr. WATKINS. That was the idea of the law, and to all intents and purposes it operated that way, except in cases left over, where parties did not assert their claims for two years. It was not contemplated in the original act that anything should be done except that the claims of the parties should be asserted before the court; it was not contemplated that there should be an act of Congress to put the law into effect for the purpose of allowing them to collect the amount. The obstacle in the way has been time, and that was eliminated by section 162, and then the other feature that refers to the loyalty was raised in the Court of Claims and decided adversely to the Government. It is for the purpose of clearing away and preventing the delay of three years that will intervene between the time the cases are actually passed upon and an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. That is the reason for this legislation.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, it seems apparent to me that none of the questions or interrogatories or objections go to the merits of this proposition; that in every case it is plain and apparent that the cotton was taken with the idea of refunding the money in time, and that it is a clear, clean obligation of the Government. As to the one question of loyalty, I do not see why the Government would want to put up a defense of that kind, refusing to pay the money because the owners of the cotton had not been loyal to the Government on account of the Civil War at a date prior to the taking of the cotton. It seems to me that is the situation, and I do not see why this bill should not pass. The merits of the case were passed upon by Congress in a former act in 1911. It seems to me there has been no objection developed on the floor to the passage of this bill, and I see no reason why we should not adopt the act.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. In view of the statement of the gentleman from Washington, it might be interesting if the gentleman could tell us whether there are any conditions in the receipts that were given by the Federal officers.

Mr. WATKINS. So far as my personal examination of the receipts which I have seen go, there are not. They simply state that in pursuance of their authority under this act so many bales of cotton had been taken, claimed to be owned by such and such a party, designating the party, the proceeds of which are to be converted into the Treasury, subject to the owner's order, under showing in the Court of Claims.

Mr. MOORE. There was no suggestion in the receipts that the Government was to refund?

Mr. WATKINS. No.

Mr. MOORE. So that it was just a plain receipt or acknowledgment by the Government that the property had been taken?

Mr. WATKINS. That is all—that is, under that law. [Cries of "Vote!"] Mr. Chairman, there are several who would like to be heard on this subject upon this side, and perhaps there are those on the other side who would like to be heard. I do not feel disposed to unduly hasten the matter, and will not ask that the matter be voted on until everyone has had ample opportunity to express his views on the subject. This question was discussed at considerable length during a former session of Congress, and I suppose is pretty well understood by all of us; but still I want full and free discussion.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I notice the gentleman referred to Executive Document No. 23?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Is this document supposed to contain the names of all of the parties whose cotton was taken?

Mr. WATKINS. That document is supposed to contain the names of all those from whom the cotton was taken after June 1, 1865, and the proceeds converted into the Treasury, the balance now remaining in the Treasury subject to the claim of those parties.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Does the bill confine itself in its provisions to these people?

Mr. WATKINS. Not to those names, but to the amount.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It does not necessarily confine itself to the names contained in this document?

Mr. WATKINS. No. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there have been within the last two or three years several efforts made to abolish the proof of loyalty in connection with war claims. The captured and abandoned property act of 1863, as I recall, provided that the Government would repay to the owners of the property which was seized and sold the net proceeds where the claim was made within two years, but proof of loyalty was required. After that act was passed, another act was passed again extending the time for filing claims after the original time had run out.

I believe that extension was for two years longer, and from shortly after 1873 or 1874 until two or three or four years ago these claims were as dead as doornails. During all the time our Democratic friends were in possession of this House, and for eight years in control of the Presidency, I believe no one of them got his gall up far enough to seriously insist upon payment of these old dead claims. Of course, everyone has sympathy for those who lose life or property in time of war, but there are certain results of war which are inevitable. One of them is the loss of life and another is the loss of property. When we had the judicial title act before us for revision and codification a few years ago, as I recall it, the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], who now graces the position of Chairman of this Committee of the Whole, offered an amendment at a time when the committee was pretty well entangled with that bill to insert in the codification a revival of the old law, which was then long obsolete, providing for the payment of these claims. I remember very well how that provision got into the law. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moon] had charge of that bill, and when in charge of the bill he used to take a seat either behind or in front of me on the main aisle and would ask me for parliamentary advice. Owing to the condition of the Committee of the Whole at that time, I advised the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Judge Moon, to accept the amendment. The amendment was agreed to in the House. I was very confident that it would not remain in the bill in conference. That was a case, however, of misplaced confidence. I was wrong, for it did remain in the bill in conference, I suppose through the activity of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] and the lack of activity on the part of the conferees. For the first time in 40 years, I believe, it was seriously proposed to pay any of these old claims. I may be mistaken about the length of time, but they were all outlawed.

When this provision was inserted in the law claims were filed, and it so happened that in another provision of the act proof of loyalty was required on certain claims, and the Court of Claims said that the proof of loyalty was required in these cases. There have been a large number of bills introduced into this House in this Congress and in the last Congress to pay not only these claims, not only all of the cotton claims growing out of the same act, but a good many other similar claims; and while gentlemen may say that these particular claims covered by this bill are differentiated from other claims, I do not believe that it is practicable for the Government to abandon the requirement of the proof of loyalty in any of these cases without continually extending that abandonment to other cases, and in the end involving us in the payment of many millions or hundreds of millions of dollars. I would be very glad to see all the people in the South repaid all of the losses which they incurred, which were enormous, if that were a practicable thing to do, but it is not; and while personally they may not be to blame, and I do not blame them or criticize them, yet what happened is the result of the war, and in the main up to date the people of the South have been willing to accept the results of the war, including their personal losses which came through it, without complaint, for which I highly honor them. But gentlemen now come in and say, "Oh, this property was taken after the war closed." Theoretically that is not true, and where it was taken actually it is not so. Where this property was taken, the localities were still in insurrection, in the main. Theoretically the war was not closed. The bill provides, for instance, a two-year limitation. Why? Did anybody suspect that the two-year limitation amounts to anything?

Mr. WATKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. WATKINS. The question is asked why. I did not have an opportunity to explain that on account of the numerous questions that were asked me. I will tell the gentleman why. It is because the Court of Claims in passing on this claim filed in the court a short time ago, the case against Wilson, decided they would have to hold these matters over for an indefinite length of time, so that all parties could come in, unless there was a time limit fixed.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman has not given any reason at all for the putting in of a limitation. He has not touched it; he has not approached the subject.

Mr. WATKINS. It is at the suggestion of the Court of Claims.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken, and that shows the gentleman does not fully comprehend what it is to put in the bill such a proposition. Here is a provision for a limitation. Why do you put in a limitation? Why any limitation? There has been put in a limitation on these claims several times before. Did it have any effect? Not at all; and the other day one of the committees of this House reported into the House a bill and in the report stated Congress had passed a bill providing for the payment of similar claims if filed within two years' time. These particular claims had not been filed within two years, and hence the committee said, in reference to the decision of Congress about paying those claims, that we certainly ought to waive the limitation and report in favor of it. The limitation amounts to nothing in these matters. There is no intention of having it amount to anything. Another provision of the bill is that when judgment is rendered the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the judgment. I suppose that is in one of those old laws. Of course the Secretary of the Treasury can not pay money out of the Treasury unless there is an appropriation made, but this bill pays no attention to the constitutional requirement. They have decided to pay these claims without proof of loyalty and in addition set aside the Constitution of the State without any compunction of conscience at all. We can not provide that the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay a judgment out of his own pocket and, under the circumstances, he can not pay it out of the Treasury unless an appropriation is made for that purpose, and there is no appropriation made here. Another provision of this bill is to waive the statute of limitation in one end of it and put in a statute of limitation in another end, waiving the statute of limitation entirely.

Then, Mr. Chairman, to come to the real point of the bill, it is provided that no allegation of proof of loyalty ought to be required in the presentation or adjudication of these claims. I am not in favor of waiving the proof of loyalty in this class of cases. I presume the loyalty, as the term is used here, has a well-defined meaning, and, in view of recent events, I have wondered just what was meant by the term "loyalty." Here we had a question the other day, and we have been trying to discover ever since whether a Democrat is loyal to his platform, to his President, or to the party or to the country. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Some of them claim loyalty because they do what the President tells them to do like automatons. Some of them claim loyalty because they follow the platform without thinking. A few of them said they were loyal because they believed in the country. Of course, the latter excuse is the better. I do not know what excuse the Democratic candidate over in New Jersey yesterday made. I believe his excuse was that he was loyal to the President; to hades with the platform and the country. I notice, according to the newspaper statements, that various distinguished gentlemen going over to New Jersey in the campaign expressed their opinions somewhat on the same line. A very distinguished United States Senator, who formerly graced this House—Senator JAMES, of Kentucky—is reported to have said in the New Jersey campaign the other day:

> The eyes of the country just now are upon the voters of the seventh New Jersey district. If the Democratic candidate is defeated, it will be taken as a personal insult to President Wilson, coming, as it does, from his own State.

The papers reported the other day that President Wilson said that he had been personally insulted in debates on the floor of the House. I do not know whether he made such a statement, but, if he did, he forgot his position. It is not the business nor the right of the President of the United States to comment upon the debates upon the floor of the House and to make animadversions upon them. Then another distinguished Senator—I do not know just where he is on the tolls question—a very handsome and great orator and statesman, coming from my State, for whom I have a very high personal regard, the Hon. JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS, stated in New Jersey, as reported by the papers:

> If this man is not elected, New Jersey will be dishonored before the whole country.

Senator JAMES is reported to have said that if the Democratic candidate was not elected the President would be dishonored before the country. Senator LEWIS is reported to have said that under those circumstances New Jersey would be dishonored. Well, I do not know whether the President is dishonored or whether, in his opinion, his State is dishonored, but we are feeling very happy on this side of the House. [Applause on the Republican side.] President Wilson himself has gratuitously precipitated upon the country the tolls question. He took the trouble to interfere in the New Jersey election, and he is reported to have said:

> May I not, as the time for the election approaches, send you this line of warm indorsement?
>
> This is a letter addressed to the Democratic candidate.
> I hope sincerely that the people of your district will elect you to the House, and in this way not only do you honor but also show their judgment with regard to the present administration.

And they did. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] They showed their judgment—very good judgment it was, too. They showed their judgment by giving the Republican candidate 10,620 votes as against 5,240 for the Democratic candidate, when only two years ago, when a Democrat was running upon the platform providing for free tolls, the Democratic candidate received 9,990 votes as against 6,666 for the Republican candidate. [Applause on the Republican side.] A decided reversal of votes, and it shows a reversal of public opinion. I want to give thanks that there have been some Democrats who have placed allegiance to their country above personal bowing to a boss, and I honor them; but the majority on the other side, repudiating their platform, repudiating their campaign pledges, bowing to the will of one man without reason, have received what President Wilson said would be the judgment of the country, and the judgment yesterday was against you. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It is only a precursor of what will come. [Applause on the Republican side.] The other day when I was in Alabama attending the funeral of our late beloved Member, Judge Richardson, I read an advertisement in one of the local papers there, prepared and inserted by the campaign manager, as stated, of the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. HOBSON, in which the charge was made against his opponent, Mr. UNDERWOOD, that UNDERWOOD had deserted the President and was against him on the tolls question, and stating that he had betrayed the interests of the Democratic Party. UNDERWOOD, who had the courage, which most of you did not have [applause on the Republican side], to stand for what he believed to be right, got a greater victory than anybody expected [applause], doubtless influenced by his right stand on that question.

A very distinguished Senator, who was formerly a Member of this House in high standing, is reported to have said that he would not be a candidate for reelection because the people were not with him on the tolls question. I admire the latter judgment of the Senator from Ohio, for whom I have great regard. He was right if he said the people were not with him on the tolls question; though I am sorry that, in spite of that, he is not to be returned to the Senate.

But all along the line gentlemen will find that because the Carnegie Peace Foundation instituted a personal campaign among a number of influential persons in the United States secretly to get them in line on the tolls question on the English side that that is not going to deliver the country. [Applause.] The people of the country are pretty wide-awake at all times. They know where the honor of our country is. They know that the honor of the country does not require us to bend the knee before a foreign power on any false pretenses. [Applause on the Republican side.] Gentlemen will find that when the country passes its judgment upon these questions the people of the country will stand for America. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, the election in New Jersey yesterday was not the only election. A very distinguished Member of this House was recently elected mayor of the city of Boston, coming from a very strong Democratic district. They elected his successor yesterday. The Democratic candidate, having some desire to be elected, boldly announced that he would not follow the President, but that he would follow CHAMP CLARK. [Applause.] The Progressive candidate announced that he was against the position of the President. The Republican candidate was a little equivocal on the subject. What was the result? Nearly everybody in that district was against the President. If the Republican candidate, in my opinion, had had the boldness to come out on the tolls question on the American side, he would have gotten a great many more votes than he did. But the Democratic candidate, standing upon his party platform, on the platform of CHAMP CLARK, as against your majority side of the House, won hands down. [Applause.] And when he comes here, repudiating what you have done, and is sworn in, you will have the nerve to give him the glad hand.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 26 minutes and has 34 minutes remaining.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana has five minutes remaining.

Mr. WATKINS. Let him be recognized in his own right for one hour, then.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TOWNSEND] will be recognized now.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, even a very unimportant matter can be made to seem important if it is discussed by the distinguished and scholarly Representative from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. I only wish to say, in response to his observations upon certain political happenings yesterday, that evidently he is not wholly acquainted with recent political legislation in New Jersey. I refer, Mr. Chairman, to the reapportionment of congressional districts. After the census of 1910 a Republican legislature took charge of the agreeable duty of redistricting New Jersey. It has been said, Mr. Chairman, frequently in the newspapers and in discussions here upon the floor, that the district which the late Mr. Bremner represented was the district represented by the present Senator, Mr. HUGHES, recently a Member of this House. Such, so far from being the case, is almost exactly opposite from being the case. The district of Mr. HUGHES ran from the North River to the Delaware River. In their amiable activities in redistricting that part of the State a Republican legislature took away from Mr. HUGHES's district, as the Members of this House remember it, every portion of the district in which a Democratic majority or a large Democratic vote might be expected, and reduced the district to a mere handful, geographically, of people who have been voting against Democratic principles ever since they have had a vote. And that Republican legislature, trimming it here and there, artfully and skillfully, produced a district where every possible political circumstance imaginable was framed to return a Republican Member to this House. However, it will be said that a Democrat has been elected from that district since the redistricting of it occurred. Truly, "Bob" Bremner was elected. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that if the municipality of Paterson or the municipality of Passaic, either of them, through their boards of aldermen, had wanted to pass an ordinance making it a misdemeanor to vote against "Bob" Bremner there would have been no objection to the ordinance. "Bob" Bremner was one of the gentlest, sweetest souls ever created by God, and I sometimes think his Creator said, "Having produced this sweet nature, I will put it to the test." "Bob" Bremner was nominated as a Democratic candidate, and, Mr. Chairman, as I have said, you could easily have passed, in any municipality in that district, an ordinance making it a misdemeanor to vote against him. Therefore he was elected. Yesterday, under normal conditions, the district should have been 10,000 Republican. There were abnormal conditions which should have made it 15,000 Republican, and the Republicans carried it only by the very reduced majority of 5,000, and if you Republicans can get any satisfaction out of that, I give it to you.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman remember when the Republicans carried the Paterson district before?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I can remember——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's memory reaches a long way back, then.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The district, as it is at present established, is absolutely without any relation whatever to any district in that part of New Jersey since the Government was established.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman remember when the Republicans carried the Paterson district before?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am not an encyclopedia of political information. Of course, the gentleman is, and he is asking the question merely for curiosity. I am telling the gentleman that this district was skillfully developed into a Republican district; and the results, all the arduous work of a Republican legislature, were developed as shown by the figures printed in the papers this morning.

The Republicans should have carried the district by 15,000, and they carried it by 5,000. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MANN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TOWNSEND] why he did not inform the President about the political situation there before the President committed himself to carrying this district, and before he sent four Senators up there and tried to get the Secretary of State to go there, when he was ill? Why did he not tell the President, so that he would not have gotten his foot in that hole? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will say that I am not in a position to tell the President anything, because I am persona non grata at the White House. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. I wonder if the Democratic Party is split all to pieces. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. TOWNSEND. With great pleasure.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman, I happen to know, is a friend of my good friend the Democratic Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. If the gentleman was not in a position to tell the President in advance what was going to happen up there, why did he not communicate the facts to the Senator, so as to prevent him from going to the district and putting his foot in it by announcing to the voters and making the people of the country believe that it would be "an insult to the President" if the district did not go Democratic? [Laughter on the Republican side.] Why did not the gentleman save my friend and his from that?

Mr. TOWNSEND. If I had charge of the communications directed to the President, I would have informed him of some important facts in the past which would have resulted in his good. [Laughter.] But I have no communications with the President. I can not get a postmaster appointed in my district. I arose, Mr. Chairman, merely in behalf of historical truth to inform, particularly, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]——

Mr. MANN. To make excuses, the gentleman means. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is so agreeable at all times to talk with the gentleman from Illinois that I want to go on for one minute. He was so misinformed as to the construction of the district in which a Republican was elected yesterday that I was certain he would thank me for informing him and for once putting him right as to some political facts in New Jersey.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, for many years the Paterson district——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire recognition?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. For many years the Paterson (N. J.) district was represented by Senator HUGHES in the House here. He was a strong man, and we were always told that it was a Republican district, and that Mr. HUGHES was elected because of his personal popularity. Now, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TOWNSEND] makes the same excuse for the district in regard to Mr. Bremner's election, saying that that was personal popularity, too. I have no doubt that many Republicans voted for the Democratic candidate before. That was the trouble all over the country. [Laughter.] That was the reason why Democratic candidates were elected. That is the reason why you have a majority here.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. MANN. In just a moment. It is because Republicans were voting for Democratic candidates. [Renewed laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. In just a moment. All we need to do is to get back a respectable portion of the Republicans who have been voting for Democratic candidates to wipe you fellows off the face of the earth; and they are coming back. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. I merely wanted to suggest to the gentleman that, as he recalls, Mr. HUGHES was also once defeated in that district, showing that it was a close one. I agree with the gentleman in the statement that he lost the respectable portion of the party by their voting the Democratic ticket. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I did not say that. Of course the gentleman from Kentucky thinks that he is the only respectable person in his community, and yet I notice that the gentleman from Kentucky came very close to the edge the last time. Enough respectable men in his community failed to vote for him, so that be barely got under the wire. [Laughter.] That is a fair response to the gentleman's insinuation about respectability.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman; will the gentleman yield to me for just one moment?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. He has again inadvertently, I am sure, referred to this district as if it was identical with the Hughes district.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I understand the districts, when a State is redistricted, are changed. I am perfectly well aware of that. My district has been changed a number of times since I have been in Congress. So has the gentleman's district, no doubt.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Quite so.

Mr. MANN. The city of Paterson is the principal place of the district that dominates the politics of the district; and although it had a tariff bill made which gave tender mercies to the silk industries in the President's State; although the State received favoritism, if that can be said of anything in the making up of a tariff bill—and certainly we thought so—yet the people over there, according to the President's own letter, have "passed judgment on the administration." This is a nisi judgment. We will make it final in November. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas in my own time for the purpose of asking a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi yields to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to ask the gentleman from Mississippi if he has heard from the State of New Jersey? And before he gives his opinion as to just what the election meant, will he in his time let me say what I think it meant?

Mr. HARRISON. I did not hear of many Progressives up there, I want to say. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURDOCK. I wish to state what I think the New Jersey election meant, and that is primarily what brings me to my feet. There are various ways of interpreting the New Jersey election.

Mr. ANSBERRY. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. What is your interpretation?

Mr. MURDOCK. When I arose this morning and read the result in New Jersey I was not wholly pleased, but I was a long way from being wholly displeased. The Republican candidate in New Jersey and the Socialist candidate were against the President on the proposition of surrendering our sovereignty over the Panama Canal. The Progressive candidate and the Democratic candidate were with the President on the proposition of surrendering our canal, and their vote at the polls shows it.

Now, there were three things entering into the New Jersey campaign: One, the Panama Canal tolls proposition, which was most important because it was current; second, the tariff proposition, because the Paterson district is a district that is intimately affected by tariff changes; third, the labor proposition. And so far as the third proposition is concerned, I am surprised that the Democratic Party does not take its lesson to heart. It may be well enough to play up as the more important issue in the New Jersey election the question of the Panama Canal tolls. I hope, for my part, that the result in New Jersey in that regard will have its effect upon the Democratic patriots in the Senate and that the Sims bill will be killed there. [Applause.] I hope, too, that the Democratic Party during its tenure in power, nationally, will again revise the tariff and revise it in a proper way, the way in which it revised the tariff two years ago when it was seeking power—one schedule at a time.

And there is another flag of danger, of real danger, that I want to put up before the leaders of the Democratic Party, and that is in the matter of their treatment of labor. It was the labor vote over in New Jersey yesterday which in large part deprived you of chance of victory. Now, why?

Mr. SMITH of Texas rose.

Mr. MURDOCK. No; I will not yield now. I will at the end of five minutes. What is the matter with the Democratic attitude toward labor? I will tell you. You promised in your platform in specific terms to exempt organized labor from the Sherman antitrust law, and you have not done it. You have fooled along for months. You pledged the leaders of organized labor a year ago that as soon as the tariff and the currency were out of the way you would report to the House such a bill and get it over to the Senate. You have not done any such thing. You have left the Bartlett-Bacon bill in committee. It is hanging there. This is April. A lot of the appropriation bills have not gone through yet. They have the right of way.

Mr. SHERLEY rose.

Mr. MURDOCK. No; I will not yield now. What are we going to have? We are going to see the old bunko game of holding the measure in the committee, getting it out in the House so late in the session that when it goes to the Senate it will die there. Now, if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] will restrain himself just a moment, here is the pledge to labor in your platform, a pledge every member of organized labor in this country knows, for a goodly number of them voted the Democratic ticket because you put it in your platform. Here is the Democratic plank:

> The expanding organization of industry makes it essential that there should be no abridgment of the right of the wage earners and producers to organize for the protection of wages and the adjustment of labor conditions, to the end that such labor organizations and their members should not be regarded as illegal combinations in restraint of trade.

If the Democratic leaders in this country know what they are about as party leaders, they will back track on their present attitude toward labor. They received most of the organized labor vote in this country last year, and they received it on a specific promise. You will not retain that vote unless you live up to your platform.

Every Democrat within the sound of my voice knows that the Democratic Party down here has not lived up to that platform. Why did you not do it on the canal-tolls proposition? The people of this country are overwhelmingly against you for your position on that, and the vote, not only in New Jersey but in Massachusetts, shows it, and the vote throughout the northern section of this country in November will prove it over and over again.

Mr. HARRISON. Has the gentleman finished his question?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes; and I am obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the gentleman want to ask another question?

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] would like to ask me a question, and I should be glad to have him ask it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. I wanted to ask the gentleman from Kansas if he was for the Bartlett-Bacon bill?

Mr. MURDOCK. I have always voted for it when it came in as an amendment on an appropriation bill, and if the Bartlett-Bacon bill comes in as a separate bill I shall vote for it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is the gentleman from Kentucky in favor of it?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will state my position.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman stand for the measure?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; not for the Bartlett-Bacon bill. I would like to ask the gentleman what he thinks of the letter written by Mr. Roosevelt, the leader of his party, who has some power with Progressives, touching this measure?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Roosevelt is the leader of my party, but my relations with him are such that, unlike the gentleman's relations, I do my own thinking. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERLEY. All I have to say is that my position on the tolls matter is the same position that it was two years ago. So the statement of the gentleman is altogether wrong. [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to say to the gentleman from Kentucky in all fairness, because I do not think there is any Member of the House who has any greater admiration for the gentleman's mentality than I have, I believe if the gentleman could have continued for two weeks to study the canal-tolls proposition, as indicated by the last speech he made on the floor of the House, he would have been over on our side. I really believe that. I listened to the last speech of the gentleman from Kentucky on the canal proposition, and he came nearer to giving his case away in that speech than in any other speech I ever heard him make on the floor of the House.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is so far wrong on that question that it is perfectly natural that he should be wrong touching my view of the question.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. How does the gentleman from Kentucky, a great publicist, a man of great foresight and great talents—and by the way a very extreme partisan—how does the gentleman from Kentucky, as a leader of the Democratic Party, expect party success for his side when his party turns against the plain pledges it made to the people of the United States in its platform, and upon which pledges it was elected to power?

Mr. SHERLEY. The trouble with the gentleman's question, like most of his positions, is that his premises are altogether wrong. The Democratic Party has done no such thing and has proposed to do no such thing. It is in plain keeping with the position of the party against subsidies for a century. [Applause.] Let me ask the gentleman from Kansas a question.

Mr. MURDOCK. Let me call attention, first, to the fact that the gentleman says that in the Democratic platform there is a contradiction of pledges in regard to the Panama Canal. Can not the gentleman, as a Democrat, take warning from the Republicans over here? The Republican leaders in this country once, after having pledged a revision of the tariff downward, revised it upward. You saw what happened to them for misreading their own platform. Now, the gentleman from Kentucky and other Democratic leaders might better take warning. A pledge in a platform is a sacred thing. It may not be read in a double sense; it must be read according to the ordinary meaning of the plain English language. You pledged the people not to take the action you did in the canal tolls.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. You had a Progressive candidate in Massachusetts yesterday, and you had as the Progressive candidate two years ago in that district the same individual, and yesterday he made his fight on the canal-tolls proposition, stating his position to be against the Panama repeal bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. He did.

Mr. SHERLEY. He ran second two years ago, and this time he ran last, with several thousand votes less than he had before.

Mr. MURDOCK. Yesterday Mr. Connolly ran third by a hair. If the gentleman will possess his soul in patience and the Progressives up there will exercise the same good judgment that they did the last two times, and they nominate him again this year, he will be elected as a Progressive in November, 1914.

Mr. SHERLEY. If he makes the same progress he made yesterday, he will be going backward. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURDOCK. He will make a magnificent fight, as he did yesterday, standing against the President on the proposition of the Panama Canal tolls.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; and as a result he lost about 3,000 votes over the previous vote the year before. I am just informed by a gentleman that it is 6,000 votes less.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Not as a Progressive, but as a patriot. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HARRISON. The Progressive Party in Massachusetts needs some patriots. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I would prefer to continue for a few minutes.

Mr. MOORE. Just one question.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well.

Mr. MOORE. Did not the gentleman himself speak in the campaign in Massachusetts in behalf of the Democratic candidate?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Does not that account for the result? [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, modesty prevents me making an answer. The Progressive Party sent into the district in Massachusetts some of its ablest leaders. They had evidently a candidate of very splendid character on the ticket, a gentleman who had run well a year ago in the same district. They sent the far-famed gentleman from New York, Burke Cockran, and he spoke in that district. I believe he spoke on Saturday night for two hours, and his whole speech was pitched on the Panama Canal tolls proposition, going after and criticizing the President. The result of the election, so far as the Progressive Party is concerned, is quite telling, and you can not get any encouragement from it. In 1912, Mr. Connolly, running on the Progressive ticket, received 9,001 votes. Yesterday the same gentleman running on the same ticket received 3,592 votes. I do not think the Republican Party can take very much encouragement from the result of the election either, inasmuch as their candidate, Mr. Robinson, last year received 5,812 votes, and on yesterday their candidate, Mr. Brier, received only 3,973 votes. [Applause.] The boundary lines of that district have not been changed as in the New Jersey district since 1912. In 1912 the combined vote opposed to the Democratic candidate was 15,602, while the Democratic candidate received 14,875 votes.

In other words, in 1912 the Democratic candidate did not get a majority of the votes cast, notwithstanding the fact that he was one of the most distinguished and popular men who ever graced a seat in the Halls of Congress, proven so not only by his record here, but by the fact that the people of his city had such confidence in him that they have since promoted him to the mayoralty of that historic city. [Applause.] Not alone that. While the Democratic candidate in 1912 did not get a majority, this time what did he do? Here is what he did. There were three candidates—Mr. Brier, the Republican candidate; Mr. Connolly, the Progressive candidate; and Mr. GALLIVAN, the Democratic candidate. The Republican and Progressive candidates combined received a total of 7,565 votes, while the Democratic candidate received a total of 8,708 votes, or a majority over the combined opposition of the Republican and Progressive candidates of 1,043 votes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman not think it is a fair statement of the proposition that, so far as the Massachusetts election is concerned, the combined vote of the Progressive and Democratic tickets there show that that number of people are against the President?

Mr. HARRISON. I am coming to that in a moment.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to the gentleman that when he gets to know JIMMY GALLIVAN, the result of the whole thing will be explained to him.

Mr. HARRISON. That is true. He is a splendid fellow, and I believe will make a very able Congressman. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLETT. Does not the gentleman think it would be fair, inasmuch as he is stating how much the other gentlemen fell off from last year, to state how many votes the Democratic ticket fell off?

Mr. HARRISON. I stated all of that.

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, no.

Mr. HARRISON. I have given the votes, and you can judge for yourself. In 1912 the Democratic candidate lacked about 1,000 or 1,500 votes of getting a majority, while this year on yesterday the Democratic candidate got over a thousand votes majority. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLETT. Yes; but he fell off 6,000 votes from last year.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; but the proportion of falling off was greater on the part of the Progressive and Republican candidates than the Democratic candidate. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLETT. That is where the gentleman is mistaken, and the figures show it.

Mr. HARRISON. I can say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, however, that he may derive this much encouragement, that where in 1912 the Republican candidate ran away behind the Bull Mooser this year they were neck and neck. [Laughter.]

Mr. GILLETT. Yes; but we lost much less proportionately than did the Democratic candidate.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. And I would like to suggest to the gentleman, if he does not know it, that Mr. Gallivan, the Democratic candidate was very strongly against the President on the question of the Panama Canal tolls.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes; he was against the President's position, and I am going to come to that, if the gentleman will wait a moment. The Democratic candidate, Mr. Gallivan, did come out for free tolls, and I think it is fair to say that a majority of the people of that district, so far as I could observe, were in favor of free tolls and against the President's position on the Panama Canal toll proposition, but I do not believe that question had any very great effect on the result in the Massachusetts election yesterday, because the Democratic nominee there in every speech he made praised President Wilson for his patriotism, for his ability, for his integrity, for his good intentions, and his high motives, and stated that he was running upon the record of the Democratic Party here in the Sixty-second Congress and of the Democratic administration since it came into power, and I believe it is the record of the Democratic Party since it came into control of the Government that accounts for the increased majority for the Democratic nominee. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Republican Party worked that district very strong. They played it equally as strong as they played the district in New Jersey. They sent the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] there, and he spoke with his usual eloquence and vigor. [Applause.] They sent the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] there, and he spoke pleadingly and vociferously.

Mr. CAMPBELL. But all of that was more than overcome by the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. They did not stop there. They sent the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], who not only talked against tolls but tried to arouse sectional feeling against the Democrats by saying that the South was in the saddle. They were so far gone that they were grabbing at every straw, trying to fan the flames of prejudice against the southern people, against southern Representatives in Congress, and against the Democratic Party, but I am glad that those people were such Americans and so patriotic that they were unmoved by any such argument and condemned by their votes such demagogic utterances. [Applause.] The Republicans did not stop at sending those speakers there. They went over to the Senate and sent the distinguished Senator FALL, of New Mexico, who spoke against the President on the Mexican question and other questions. They sent the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, Senator SHERMAN, there, and he likewise lambasted the President and the Democratic Party on its record. Yet with that array of distinguished Republicans speaking in that district, when you look at the results, I say to the distinguished leader of the minority, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that if he can get any encouragement from that election he is welcome to it. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Well, I can and I do.

Mr. HARRISON. I voted against the President on the tolls question, as did the gentlemen from Massachusetts, Mr. MURRAY and Mr. MITCHELL, who spoke for the Democrats in the Boston district. [Applause.] I did it because I was willing to back up my judgment, and I thought that the President was wrong on that proposition; but when I did I never doubted for one moment his patriotism, his good intentions, or his high motives. I acted from the same motives that prompted him. I differed with him because no man is infallible, and we all make mistakes at times. You can not make the country believe that the Democratic Party to-day is disrupted. [Laughter on the Republican side.] That is what you are trying to do. You are trying to make them believe that the leaders here are divided. That is untrue. I believe that every Democrat in this Congress has implicit faith and confidence in the leaders of his party, and I believe equally as true that every leader of the Democratic Party here and in the Senate, as well as at the White House, has implicit faith and confidence in each other. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, we have before us a bill to consider [laughter], and one in which my people are interested. My people do not care anything about this flamboyant oratory about what somebody did in Boston and New Jersey yesterday in electing two Congressmen. We do not care anything about the past history of a vote on the tolls proposition. I want to say for one I am willing to stand by my vote. The American people are not paying any attention to all this wild howl you are making over this proposition of making a few rich corporations pay toll charges in the Panama Canal. Some of these gentlemen who think the people of this country are paying any attention to it ought to go down into the factories and workshops, ought to go down to the shops where the railroad men and other artisans are at work, and learn what they are thinking about, ought to go on the farms and talk to the farmers, and you will find they are paying no attention to this hurrah in a few interested newspapers. This is merely a question in which some selfish special interests and sensational newspapers are endeavoring to "raise Cain" over, but I will say I am interested in the labor question injected into this debate, and I am going to vote to exempt labor unions and farmers' unions from the application of the antitrust law. Everybody knows these organizations are not trusts in restraint of trade. I will say the people of my country and of the Southern States are thinking about this sum of $7,500,000 lying over in the Treasury of this Government for cotton that was taken from their plantations after June 1, 1865, and they are vitally interested in this bill that we are presumed to consider now. I want to say, too, gentlemen, that the question of loyalty, as referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], has been abrogated, because the President of the United States pardoned every man when the amnesty proclamation was made.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I demand order. I can not understand what explanation the gentleman from Mississippi is making in reference to the election in New Jersey on account of so much confusion. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The House will be in order.

Mr. QUIN. Here is the explanation I am giving: I am asking that this Congress permit my people and the people of the South to get what has been adjudicated to be theirs out of the Treasury of this Nation that has been lying there for 50 long years. That is the explanation I make. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HOWARD. And a very good one, too.

Mr. QUIN. And I will give you another ground for it: Do you know that at the time the Government took that cotton the Government of the United States did not do any intentional wrong to the people, but it took their cotton for a purpose? The Government did not sell for its use the cotton nor appropriate it, but it sold the cotton taken under the act of 1863 and after paying the charges for transportation and such like the money was deposited over in the Treasury of the Government. Now, then, the men who owned the bulk of that cotton were men who were true to their side in this war from 1861 to 1865. They were fighting for the South. Many of them in my district with many others went out and fought for the Confederacy. If I had been 15 years old, I would have been fighting for the South. Why, gentlemen, you should understand a man who lived down there would have been considered a traitor if he had not stuck up to the South; and I want to say to gentlemen in my estimation the man who stayed in Mississippi during that struggle and did not take sides with the South was considered disloyal to his country, and was in a measure disgraced, and the same stigma hangs there to-day. So how do you expect a man to say he was loyal to the Union when he was not? Then the Government, through the President, by one broad stroke, did away with that question and said that you are all loyal when you took oath of allegiance to this Nation after the war had ended, and said to the people who had done their Government a wrong, "You did right by coming into this Union under the amnesty act of President Johnson."

Now, after the money is over in the Treasury, showing the receipts and showing directly to whom this money be paid, why should the question of loyalty enter now? That money does not belong to the Government. It does not belong to all the people of this Nation. It is the property of the men and women from whom it was taken, and it is high time that this great Government should refund it to the good people of the South. This bill simply asks that the United States Government be honest toward a certain number of its citizens. I do not care where the property had been taken from; if it had been Massachusetts, Maine, Pennsylvania, or any other place, as a Representative on the floor of this House I would vote for the people to get the money according to the receipts in the Treasury and any other bona fide evidence of ownership. I do not believe that this question of loyalty ought to come into it because of another fact. Your Court of Claims has recently decided that that question does not apply. The Court of Claims decided specifically and in no indefinite terms that the question of loyalty did not enter into the case and that the amnesty act of the President of the United States had done away with that question. In other words, the man who went out into the Confederate campaign and fought against the United States Government has been pardoned under the amnesty act of the President. Now, gentlemen, that money belongs to those people; there are safeguards over it to protect the rightful claimants. Why not allow us to pass this act here to-day, that the owners of that money may receive it? Why should this Congress hold that question of loyalty and prevent those people or their heirs from getting their money after awaiting the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States for all these years? This bill ought to pass right now. It is common justice; it is common honesty; it is right, and it is fair, and it is equity, and I do not believe that any section of this country ought to want to hold an unjust law against any other section of it, and as one man in this Congress, I am never going to cast my vote in a sectional manner to continue a wrong on any section. [Applause.]

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, I did not happen to be on the floor of the House on last Saturday when two Members took occasion to challenge the motives of the Federal reserve organization committee in locating the regional reserve banks as recently announced, nor did I happen to be on the floor of the House yesterday when the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ] read into the RECORD those remarkably vindictive and vituperative resolutions adopted by a mass meeting in New Orleans on the 4th of this month. I did come on the floor in time to hear the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] say something in this connection which, upon reflection, I am sure he will deeply regret. In the debates of Congress, when we consider the complete immunity which Representatives may claim, a Member, above everything, should be careful of his public utterances. And I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], upon reflection, will regret that he stood in his place here yesterday and personally aspersed a member of the Federal Reserve Board, even to the amazing extent of bringing in question his personal integrity. Had anyone in my presence thus assailed the gentleman from Illinois in any forum where I had the privilege of speech, I would have resented the assault on him as quickly and as indignantly as I now resent his aspersion of the Comptroller of the Currency. The attack upon that official, without means of defense, was wanton and altogether unworthy of the gentleman from Illinois, who on all occasions hitherto has been perfectly fair and frank, as well as courageous in his utterances here, no matter what was the nature of the question in controversy. I think the gentleman should expunge from the RECORD his offensive personal reference to the Comptroller of the Currency.

As to the wretched clatter about politics being involved in the action of the Federal reserve organization committee, it is positively so trifling that I find myself unable to speak temperately of it. What sort of politics could be involved in the location of these regional reserve banks? Maryland is a closely contested State at elections, and the city of Baltimore, which usually controls the political situation there, is close also. How could a Democratic organization committee have successfully played politics in the State of Maryland by depriving the commercial center of that State of a Federal reserve bank? Can it be conceived that the members of the organization committee were foolish enough to suppose that by depriving Baltimore of a Federal reserve bank they would strengthen the Democratic Party in a close State like Maryland?

And so with the city of Richmond, in a State with 50,000 Democratic majority. Could the organization committee have been simple enough to imagine that it might help the Democratic Party in Virginia by giving Richmond a Federal reserve bank? The Democratic Party in Virginia did not need help. Where is the politics of the situation? The politics is right here on the floor of the House and nowhere else; and the character of the politics is illustrated by the talk of the gentleman from the State of Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], who started out to make politics of this banking and currency measure and has continued to make very small politics of it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

What possible political motive could have prompted the Federal reserve committee to deprive New Orleans of a Federal reserve bank? Is it conceived that depriving a Democratic city like New Orleans of a bank might help the Democratic Party in the State of Louisiana? Did this Democratic Federal reserve organization committee dream that it might convert the Republican city of Philadelphia by giving it a Federal reserve bank, after having made Maryland and Louisiana safely Democratic by depriving Baltimore and New Orleans of a bank each? Mr. Chairman, it is unutterably silly to talk about there being any politics in the location of these Federal reserve banks.

Regional reserve banks are established under the spirit and text of the Federal reserve act, not to serve Baltimore, or Richmond, or New Orleans, or Atlanta, or any particular city, but to serve the entire country. And the regional reserve bank is established largely with respect to the commerce and the customary channels of trade of the region in which it is located, and not altogether with reference to the banking resources or the population of the city in which it is situated.

It might be imagined, from the clamor that has been raised over the designation of Federal reserve cities, that the banking facilities of some communities will be seriously impaired and that they will be deprived of business they have for years enjoyed in the regular process of trade. Could any suggestion be more senseless? Baltimore, for instance, will not lose one dollar of the banking business it has to-day by reason of the location of a regional reserve bank at Richmond. Nor will New Orleans lose one dollar of its banking business by reason of the location of a regional reserve bank in the city of Atlanta. In Baltimore and in New Orleans a branch regional reserve bank will be located, and those branches will fully maintain the banking prestige of those cities. So that, after all, the location of regional reserve banks affords little advantage except in merely a sentimental way or in the way of advertising. When it comes to the practical work of banking, the advantage of having one of these regional banks has been infinitely exaggerated. Congress could not, if it would, interfere with the usual courses of banking or the activities of commerce, nor could anything that the organization committee has done or might do in the establishment of regional reserve banks divert or seriously affect the ordinary course of business transactions. All of this childish talk about some prejudiced person desiring to deprive New York of its preeminence as a commercial and financial center is nonsense. New York is the commercial and financial center of the United States, and it is going to continue to be. Nothing that Congress or this organization committee may do will alter that fact.

Mr. Chairman, with no animosity on earth toward the city of Baltimore, or the city of Washington, or any of the cities involved in this dispute, I desire to put upon record some facts relating to this useless controversy. It is not done to disparage Baltimore or Washington, nor with any view of unduly magnifying the commercial importance of the city of Richmond, but solely with a view to justifying the action of the Federal reserve organization committee and to demonstrate to the House that this talk of "partisan and personal motives" is the sheerest nonsense.

Federal reserve bank district No. 5 is composed of the States of Maryland, Virginia, West Virgina (except four counties), and North and South Carolina and the District of Columbia. These States have always been closely bound together commercially and financially, and their business relations are large and intimate.

The reports made to the Comptroller of the Currency on January 13, 1914, by all the national banks in each of these States show, in every essential respect, that the business of the national banks in Virginia, including Richmond, is far ahead of the business of the national banks of Maryland, including Baltimore, or of any other of the five States embraced in district No. 5.

The capital and surplus of the Virginia national banks on the date mentioned was $32,000,000, against $31,300,000 in Maryland, including Baltimore; $18,000,000 in West Virginia, $13,300,000 in North Carolina, $10,000,000 in South Carolina, and $12,000,000 in the District of Columbia.

In their loans and discounts—$108,500,000—the Virginia national banks exceeded those of Maryland by about $18,000,000, or 20 per cent.

The total individual deposits, including certificates of deposit, of the national banks in Virginia, including Richmond, amounted to $92,300,000, against $84,700,000 in Maryland, including Baltimore, the State in district No. 5 in which individual deposits were next greatest; the individual deposits of the District of Columbia, including Washington, being $29,000,000.

In the poll taken by the organization committee 431 banks in district No. 5 expressed their preferences for the location of a regional bank. Richmond received more first-choice ballots than any other city in the district, namely, 167, against 128 for Baltimore, 35 for Pittsburgh, 28 for Columbia, S. C., 27 for Cincinnati, and 25 for Washington, D. C. Of the remaining 21 votes 19 were for Charlotte, N. C., and 2 for New York. Leaving out the States of Maryland and Virginia, Richmond received from the rest of the district three times as many first-choice votes as were cast for Baltimore.

In the growth of the capital and general business of the national banks Richmond outstripped both Washington and Baltimore. The capital and surplus of the national banks of Richmond increased 219 per cent in the period from 1903 to 1913 against an increase for the same period in Washington of 83 per cent and in Baltimore of 4 per cent. The loans and discounts of the national banks in Richmond increased in the same 10-year period 207 per cent, or from $11,300,000 to $34,700,000, while the loans and discounts in the national banks of Washington for the same period increased 89 per cent, or from $14,300,000 to $26,800,000. The loans and discounts in national banks of Baltimore for the same period increased from $47,222,000 to $63,703,000, or 35 per cent.

In individual deposits the national banks in Richmond increased in this 10-year period from $9,600,000 to $24,300,000, an increase of 152 per cent. The increase in the national banks of Washington for the same period was 40 per cent, or from $18,600,000 to $26,300,000, while the individual deposits in the national banks of Baltimore increased in the same 10 years 38 per cent, or from $32,100,000 to $44,500,000.

The banks in New Orleans have criticized the decision of the organization committee and have given out relative figures as to New Orleans, Richmond, and other cities which are incorrect and misleading. An analysis and study of the actual figures will be found instructive and can lend no support to the claims which New Orleans is making.

From the sworn special reports recently submitted to the Comptroller of the Currency it appears that the national banks in Richmond were lending on loans and discounts in the 13 Southern States on January 13, 1914, more money than was being loaned by the national banks in any other city in the country except New York, and nearly twice as much as was being loaned by the national banks in Chicago in the same section. The total loans and discounts in the 13 Southern States of the national banks in Richmond amounted to $33,473,000. The loans in the same territory being made by the Baltimore national banks were $6,891,000, and by the national banks in Washington $915,000; in New Orleans, $19,477,000. In other words, the national banks in Richmond were lending in the 13 Southern States more than four times as much money as all the national banks in Baltimore and Washington combined; 70 per cent more than the national banks of New Orleans, and more money than the national banks in the central reserve cities of Chicago and St. Louis combined.

The figures also show that in those portions of district No. 5 outside of the States of Virginia and Maryland the Richmond national banks are lending twice as much money as all the national banks in Baltimore and Washington combined are lending in the same district. They also show that although Richmond is not a reserve city, the banks and trust companies in the 13 Southern States had on deposit in the national banks of Richmond on February 14, 1914, $9,876,000, or slightly more than these same banks had on deposit in the city of Baltimore, and four times as much as they carried in Washington, which two cities have long enjoyed the benefits of being reserve cities. That southern banks should carry larger balances in Richmond, where they could not be counted in their reserves, rather than in Baltimore or Washington, where they could be counted, is suggestive.

The statistics also show that the capital and surplus of all reporting banks—National, State, and savings and trust companies—per capita in Richmond, as of June 4, 1913, was $131, against $85 in Baltimore, $88 in Washington, and $60 in New Orleans, while the loans and discounts made by all banks and trust companies in Richmond, on the same date, amounted to $393 per capita, against $190 in Washington and $213 in Baltimore and $194 in New Orleans.

The amount of money which banks and trust companies in the various parts of the country carried on deposit with Richmond, a nonreserve city, on February 14, 1914, amounted to $10,970,000, or nearly twice as much as the balances carried by outside banks with the national banks of Washington, which on the same day amounted to $5,516,000, and one and a half times as much as was carried on that day by the national banks of New Orleans, a reserve city.

The statistics furnished the organization committee show that on March 4, 1914, the capital and surplus of the national banks in Richmond per capita amounted to more than twice as much as the capital and surplus per capita of the national banks in either Baltimore or Washington and three and a half times as much as New Orleans, while the individual deposits of the national banks in Richmond amounted to $201 per capita, against $86 in Washington and $76 in Baltimore and $50 in New Orleans. The loans and discounts in the national banks in Richmond on the same date were reported at $279 per capita, against $77 in Washington and $108 in Baltimore and $51 in New Orleans.

On March 4, 1914, the capital and surplus of all national banks in Richmond was $9,314,000; in New Orleans, $6,730,000; in Washington, $11,365,000. Loans and discounts of national banks in Richmond, same day, $35,593,000; in Washington, $25,405,000; in New Orleans, $17,285,000.

In other words, the figures show that the national banks of Richmond were lending, on March 4, 1914, on loans and discounts twice as much money as all the national banks in the city of New Orleans and 40 per cent more than all the national banks of Washington.

In capital and surplus of national banks per capita Richmond exceeded New York, Chicago, St. Louis, Boston, and every other applicant city having a population of as much as 80,000, except the city of San Francisco and one other.

In the matter of individual deposits, the individual deposits in the national banks of Richmond per capita were greater than those of New York, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Chicago, and St. Louis, and every other applicant city whose population amounted to 80,000 or more, except San Francisco, Boston, and two others, and were the same as those of Dallas.

The loans and discounts of the national banks of Richmond per capita exceeded those of every other applicant city having a population of 80,000 or more, save only the city of Boston, and exceeded by more than 50 per cent the loans and discounts per capita of either Chicago or St. Louis, and were five times as great as New Orleans.

As I have said, the Federal reserve act does not purpose to establish regional reserve banks to please a few cities. They are to be established to take care of the commercial requirements and to respond to the business needs of various sections of the country, and a poll of the banks of regional division No. 5 by the Richmond Chamber of Commerce, more complete than the poll of the organization committee, showed an overwhelming majority for Richmond as the reserve city of the district. Out of a total of 437 banks in Virginia, but 4 voted for Baltimore as first choice and but 7 for Washington, while 415 voted for Richmond.

Out of a total of 486 banks in North Carolina, 442 voted for Richmond.

Out of a total of 405 banks in South Carolina, but 1 voted for Baltimore as first choice and none for Washington as first choice; but, eliminating Columbia, the State capital of South Carolina, nearly every bank in the State that responded to the poll voted for Richmond. Out of a total of 1,328 banks, 1,052 voted for Richmond, 21 for Washington, and 104 for Baltimore.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] suggested yesterday that some letters had been written in favor of Baltimore. I have no doubt that is true. Baltimore is a splendid city, and the South is proud of her commercial supremacy, but the business men of the territory comprised in regional reserve bank district No. 5 were overwhelmingly in favor of Richmond for the reserve bank. As many as 2,236 business firms in four of the States comprising this district filed letters with the Federal Reserve Board in favor of Richmond. Delegations of bankers and business men from all the States of the district except Maryland came to Washington to indicate their preference for Richmond. The audience room set apart in the Treasury Building for the hearings could not begin to hold the bankers and business men who came to Washington in behalf of Richmond. The total capital, surplus, and profits of the banks voting for Richmond aggregate $131,672,878 and the deposits of the banks voting for Richmond total in excess of $361,000,000.

My friend from Maryland also said yesterday, with a thrip of his forefinger and thumb, that Baltimore banks loaned to Richmond most of the funds which the Richmond banks loan in the Southern States. Upon just such myths as this cities which failed to get a regional reserve bank are feeding their resentment.

On February 14, 1914, the national banks of Baltimore were lending to banks, bankers, merchants, and individuals in the State of Virginia the sum of $1,306,903, while the banks and trust companies in Virginia had on deposit with the Baltimore banks the sum of $3,072,062. In other words, with a balance struck, Baltimore on the date named was indebted to Virginia banks and trust companies to the amount of $1,765,159 over and above the loans made by Baltimore banks to Virginia.

Mr. Chairman, the passionate and even desperate tenor of the resolutions adopted by the mass meeting held at New Orleans on April 4 could not be more sharply disclosed than by pointing to the malicious reference therein made to the city of Richmond. It was impertinent, as well as wantonly false, and exposes the city of New Orleans to a retort that should be humiliating to any community with a reasonable amount of civic pride. These resolutions speak of Richmond, which was not in competition with New Orleans, and with which that city has nothing to do, as "a comparatively unimportant mart of trade"; and yet, Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand an official compilation from the office of the Comptroller of the Currency giving the total loans of national banks of certain cities of the United States as of January 13, 1914; and I want to say to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ], who had the New Orleans resolution inserted in the RECORD, that the total loans of the national banks of his great metropolis on the date indicated were but $19,677,000 as contrasted with total loans of $35,721,000 of the city of Richmond.

Just in the degree that the mass meeting at New Orleans impertinently undertook to depreciate the commercial importance of Richmond, just in this proportion should that community feel humiliated by an official exhibit of this character.

Mr. ESTOPINAL. Why does the gentleman make comparisons with Richmond? New Orleans was not a competitor of Richmond.

Mr. GLASS. I am glad my courteous friend realizes that fact. One of the Members of this House from Louisiana undertook to deride Richmond, and he has elicited this comparison.

Mr. ESTOPINAL. It was a general protest against the manner in which these selections were made, and Richmond was named as an instance.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; as an "inconsequential mart of trade" that should not have a regional reserve bank. Let us see further about that.

I also hold in my hand an official statement from the Treasury Department showing bank and trust company credit balances with the national banks in certain cities as of February 14, 1914. The amount thus on deposit in the national banks of Richmond, the inconsequential mart of trade, was $10,970,068, and the amount on deposit with the national banks of her New Orleans critics was but $7,229,470.

The same statement shows the amount loaned to all banks and trust companies on bills payable and rediscounts, including indirect loans, as of January 13, 1914; and in this item the inconsequential mart of trade shows a total of $1,629,449 to a total of $1,134,102 at New Orleans.

The same statement shows the amount of bought paper, stock-exchange loans, and so forth, made by national banks to noncustomers throughout the United States as of January 13, 1914; and the total for the inconsequential mart of trade at Richmond is $4,257,528, as against $1,234,109 for the banks represented by that hysterical mass meeting of April 4 in New Orleans.

And I may add that in these comparisons Washington fares but little if any better than New Orleans in the contrast with Richmond.

Quitting this comparison of cities and turning to the banking resources of the States, I find, according to the comptroller's figures for October 21, 1913, that the aggregate national-bank resources of Virginia were $168,000,000 as contrasted with $80,000,000 for Louisiana, or eight millions more than twice as much, while the deposits in all classes of banks in these two States were $175,000,000 for Virginia against $147,000,000 for Louisiana. Virginia pays 50 per cent more internal-revenue taxes to the Federal Government than does the State of Louisiana, and in the matter of corporate capital, upon which Virginia pays to the Federal Government a tax, she leads the entire list of Southern States with $942,000,000, with Louisiana so far in the rear that she does not deserve to be mentioned in the same column.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. GLASS. I do.

Mr. COOPER. I interrupt only to say that from the resolutions to which I listened yesterday I understand it to be the chief complaint of New Orleans that she has been passed by for Dallas and Atlanta, one specific charge, among other charges made in those resolutions, being that the combined banking capital of Dallas and Atlanta is less by more than $1,000,000 than the banking capital of New Orleans alone.

Mr. GLASS. I am sure there are gentlemen here who are perfectly competent to take care of Atlanta and Dallas; but New Orleans went out of its way to deride Richmond, and I just want to show what little basis it had for interfering with our affairs up here. [Laughter.]

Although Richmond is not a reserve city, and New Orleans, Washington, and Baltimore are, Richmond had on deposit from the 15 Southern States on February 4, 1914, $9,876,000, or slightly more than the national banks had on deposit from the Southern States in the city of Baltimore and four times as much as Washington had on deposit from these Southern States.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. If the gentleman's argument that the regional banks should be located in those cities that the money seeks, why should not Pennsylvania and New Jersey and all the surrounding country go to New York?

Mr. GLASS. Because New York is too big. It started out to have a central bank, and wanted everything east of the Allegheny Mountains.

Mr. ASWELL. Is it not a fact that the arbitrary location of the boundary lines of these districts practically located the cities for the regional reserve banks?

Mr. GLASS. The gentleman knows very well that the statute authorizes the organization committee, in observing the spirit of the law, to divide the States and to not run the lines according to the State boundaries.

Mr. ASWELL. Is it not possible that if the boundary line that made the Richmond district had been very much changed, Richmond would not have been voted for?

Mr. GLASS. Oh, it is possible, Mr. Chairman, that the organization committee has made a mistake. I, for one, do not think it has, but it is possible; they are human. We may make mistakes. This Congress makes mistakes; and it is possible that the organization committee made a mistake. But I say it is unjust to asperse the patriotism and the purpose of these gentlemen by undertaking to say that they are playing politics, and by this wanton denunciation of them, like this mass meeting at New Orleans, based upon resentment and not upon recorded facts.

Mr. ASWELL. Does not the gentleman agree that it is altogether probable that by a proper location of boundary lines they would have located a bank in New Orleans?

Mr. GLASS. No; I think the boundary lines have been properly located. If I did not think so, I would not be willing to risk, haphazard, my judgment against these three gentlemen who have gone over the country from one end to the other, industriously and honestly seeking the facts and basing their action on conditions which they found.

Mr. ASWELL. But the gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. GLASS. I think I have. I said that, in my judgment, the lines have been properly located.

Mr. ASWELL. If they had been located differently, the banks would have been located differently.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, yes; if cities had been thrown into other districts. Now, I am not aspersing New Orleans, except in resentment to what New Orleans said about Richmond.

Mr. ASWELL. The gentleman will admit that New Orleans ought to have had a bank?

Mr. GLASS. I do not admit any such thing.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman does not mean to imply that the boundary lines were fixed and then the banks asked for their preference afterwards? I do not think that is true.

Mr. GLASS. I think tentatively that was the case; yes. I think that tentatively when the organization committee went over the country it ascertained the preference of the various locations. It was generally understood what cities were applicants for banks, and the organization committee, I infer, kept its record straight, and they knew when they got back to Washington what banks in certain localities favored certain cities for a location.

But I do want to say that so far as this regional district No. 5 is concerned, the vote was taken by the States as they are comprised in that territory, and Richmond had an overwhelming majority not only of the banks but the business interests of all the States outside of Maryland located in the regional district No. 5. I am not saying this in any spirit of disparagement to Baltimore. It is a great commercial city, and the South and Virginia take great pride in Baltimore. To show what I thought about this matter and about the city of Washington, when I was tentatively dividing the country up into 12 reserve regions for banks, as I did in drafting the bill, I located one of the banks in the city of Washington and I located one in New Orleans, but that only illustrates how we are apt to make mistakes.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman does not mean to imply that the people west of New Orleans voted for that district after the boundaries were fixed. The line runs just west of New Orleans, and of course the people west could not have voted after the line had been established.

Mr. GLASS. My colleague knows very well, because he is familiar with the terms of the reserve act, that the organization committee had to divide the country with reference to the minimum capital required for organizing a regional reserve bank, and in order to come within the provisions of the law it might have been necessary to divide certain States by an imaginary line, throwing one section into one regional reserve district and the other section into another regional reserve district. That was necessitated by the minimum requirement of capital, and in some instances it was necessitated by the regular course of business not being interrupted.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman has been giving some statistics showing the loans made by Baltimore and Richmond and other towns of the Southern States. Where does the gentleman get those figures?

Mr. GLASS. From the comptroller's office.

Mr. PLATT. Banks are not required to report where they make their loans.

Mr. GLASS. They do not have to do it, but they do it at the request of the comptroller, and the gentleman can go there and get the figures.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I would like to ask, purely for information, as to the tenth district, which is the one in which I reside, if after the boundaries were fixed any poll of banks was taken by the organization committee, or any opportunity given for the people in that newly organized district to say where they wanted the regional bank to be located?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; I have the poll here for district No. 10.

Mr. SLOAN. The point is was that made after the district lines were fixed?

Mr. GLASS. I have just said that I imagine that, in going over the country and holding these hearings at various convenient points, the organization committee obtained the views of the banks in each section as to where they wanted the regional reserve bank located.

A bank was located at Kansas City, and Kansas City, outside of the State of Missouri, received the votes of 327 banks, while the city of Omaha, for which a plea was made here yesterday, received outside of the State of Nebraska only 10 votes for the location of the bank. The city of Denver, outside of the State of Colorado, received but 23 votes as against 327 votes received by Kansas City. The banking resources of Kansas City are infinitely superior to the banking resources of any other city located in district No. 10.

Mr. Chairman, I did not rise here, however, to engage in a controversy as to the location of these various banks. I did not purpose assaulting Baltimore. I did want to say some tart things about those people down in Louisiana who held a mass meeting and, without any facts to sustain their position, undertook to ridicule the idea of putting a regional reserve bank at Richmond, and I did want to put into the RECORD, as I shall do, the facts in the case to show that, at most, the organization committee could have made only a mistake of judgment, and I deny that they did that. The banks are all in favor of locating the regional reserve bank in this particular district at Richmond, because the trade of the district is with Richmond, because the banking business of the district is at Richmond, and it is not "ridiculous" to say that the bank should have been located at Richmond. Gentlemen are not justified here in ascribing political motives to members of this organization committee and aspersing their personal integrity, as was done, I think in a mistaken mood, by my friend from Illinois on yesterday.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it the intention of the gentleman from Virginia to put in not only the vote on two of these cities that have been selected, but on others?

Mr. GLASS. I can do that if it is desired. I have the record.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it will be a good thing to put it in.

Mr. GLASS. I will do it, if my friend desires; yes.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. Some one asked a question about Baltimore and Richmond. I just wanted to remind the gentleman, if he has not already called attention to the figures, that the loans made by the national banks in the Southern States, with one exception—in the Richmond district—by Richmond national banks amounted to $33,473,000, while the loans made by Baltimore banks in the same Southern States amounted to only $6,891,000. In connection with that I would like to call attention to the fact that Boston, away up in New England, loaned to the Southern States almost $5,000,000, very nearly as much as Baltimore, and that Philadelphia loaned to those Southern States over $9,000,000, which is more than Baltimore loaned to the same States.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, I will say to my friend from Massachusetts that I not only made that statement but I made this further statement, which I want to repeat, as I think, perhaps, my friend from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] was out at that time. The gentleman from Maryland the other day stated that Baltimore loaned Richmond all of the money that Richmond in turn loaned the Southern States, and I have shown from actual figures that the national banks of Richmond and the State of Virginia are creditors of the Baltimore banks.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; but will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman from Virginia knows, or ought to know, that in computing the $33,000,000 which Richmond loaned to the South and the $6,000,000 which Baltimore loaned to the South, while this organization committee included Baltimore in the fifth regional district, it absolutely threw out all the loans which Baltimore made to Baltimoreans and to people in the State of Maryland, and it took all of the Richmond loans which Richmond made, and while putting Baltimore in that district excluded all of the loans made by Baltimore north of the Potomac, and if you include all of the loans of Baltimore and Maryland in the fifth district, you will find that you have $90,000,000 instead of $6,000,000.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact, if you include all of the loans that Baltimore made in the Southern States, outside of Maryland, and the loans that Richmond made in the Southern States, outside of Virginia, you will find that Richmond far exceeds Baltimore in its loans, and the figures demonstrate that fact.

Mr. Chairman, in further reference to these remarkable New Orleans resolutions, I can conjecture who wrote those resolutions. I venture to say they were written, and that entire meeting was instigated, by the representative of the State of Louisiana on the legislative committee of the American Bankers' Association. That gentleman spent a great deal of his time here in Washington, trying to convince the Banking and Currency Committee of the House specifically, and Congress in general, that there ought to be but one Federal-reserve bank in this country, and he was willing to have that located 1,500 miles from New Orleans, in the city of New York; and yet now, when Congress has passed the Federal reserve act, and the organization committee of intelligent and patriotic citizens has gone out and diligently made inquiry as to the location of these banks, and fixed the number at 12, and has located one of them to the northeast of New Orleans, within about 300 miles of that city, and one in Texas, to the southwest, this gentleman and his compatriots down there are not satisfied with the situation, and are accusing the organization committee of being guided by personal and political considerations.

I want to say again, with respect to the Comptroller of the Currency, that in considering the location of the regional reserve bank in district No. 5, the business men and bankers of the city of Richmond feared that the only weakness in the entire situation for them was the fact that the Comptroller of the Currency was a native and former resident of the city of Richmond. Knowing him to be a man of high sensibilities, they apprehended that the very fact that he was born in Richmond and had formerly resided there would influence him against Richmond and not in its behalf. I am authorized to state, moreover, that the entire organization committee voted as a unit in favor of locating a bank at Richmond. It was not due to the influence of John Skelton Williams, who happens to be the Comptroller of the Currency and a member of that organization committee.

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Chairman, in inserting those letters to which the gentleman referred he stated, for instance, the letters outside of the State of Nebraska. Inasmuch as Kansas City would be close to the edge of the State of Missouri, and Omaha is on the extreme eastern end of Nebraska, will the gentleman in inserting the letters insert the entire vote?

Mr. GLASS. That is what I said. I said, "Excluding the State of Missouri, Kansas City has 327 votes, whereas, excluding Nebraska, Omaha had only 10 votes."

Mr. BARTON. But the gentleman does not get my question yet. Kansas City is close to the edge of Missouri, and quite naturally that section of Missouri would not mean much; but it does command Kansas on the west and the southern part of Nebraska.

Mr. GLASS. Kansas was unanimous for Kansas City.

Mr. BARTON. Now, excluding Nebraska from Missouri means something, because she is on the extreme east of Omaha, and the entire business of the north and middle parts of the State is done in the city of Omaha, extending to Montana and Wyoming.

Mr. GLASS. I have no idea in the world of depreciating Omaha. I have no idea on earth of depreciating Denver.

Mr. LOBECK. The gentleman can not depreciate Omaha. It is not in him.

Mr. GLASS. I trust the gentleman will not interrupt me until I finish my sentence. I was saying to my courteous friend I have no desire in the world to depreciate Omaha, certainly no desire on earth to depreciate Denver. I very much wanted to see Denver get one of those banks for personal and other considerations, but I do very earnestly believe that the organization committee has picked Kansas City in response to the real business requirements of that territory. And I want to say to my friend, furthermore, that a branch bank at Omaha and a branch bank at Denver will be of just as much practical use to the business interests of those communities as the regional reserve bank will to the business requirements of Kansas City.

Mr. BARTON. The gentleman understands my inquiry was not of criticism but of information——

Mr. GLASS. I shall insert——

Mr. BARTON. And I ask the gentleman to insert the entire vote of the State of Nebraska.

Mr. GLASS. I shall do that.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question for information?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Can the gentleman from Virginia tell us why the tenth district is the only inland district among the 12 where a regional reserve bank was placed practically in the margin of the district, with no reference whatever to the location of population or of the wealth or of the means of transportation running through the district? I noticed this, and I presumed there was some reason; and I thought the gentleman might be able to give it. In all the other inland districts the regional reserve banks are placed with some reference to the center of population and the center of area, and also with some reference to the general lines of transportation.

Mr. GLASS. My understanding is that, after having formed district No. 10, the organization committee considered which one of the three most important cities of that district should have the regional reserve bank, and I assume they have located it with reference to the trend of trade and the business of the district and to the bank resources and to the facilities afforded by Kansas City; but I will say to my friend that he can not identify me as a factor in the location of these reserve banks. I had nothing——

Mr. SLOAN. I admit that.

Mr. GLASS. I had nothing in the world to do with it, and I am not here to raise any row about Kansas City or Denver, or any row with anybody. I simply undertake to justify, as far as regional reserve bank No. 5 is concerned, the organization board and to defend it against the assumption that there was something "ridiculous" in their action.

Mr. SLOAN. Another suggestion, if the gentleman will permit. I was trying to find out why this one exception was made in this one district, which is the largest inland district in the United States as formed and second in size in the United States, where the district is so formed that the regional bank was in the margin of the district and the vast western part beyond Omaha, which is tributary to Kansas and is a part of Kansas City business territory, was entirely cut off from the Kansas City district and given to St. Louis. Was that, as a matter of fact, to follow the course of business that one-half of the Kansas City district was entirely cut off from the East, as it leaves a vast one-sixth of the United States with a regional reserve bank away on the far-off eastern margin with a thousand miles between some banks and the regional reserve bank?

Mr. GLASS. Well, I make no sort of doubt, Mr. Chairman, but that the members of the organization committee could justify their action to my friend. I assume that the conditions there were peculiar; I can see that the organization committee was restricted in the arrangement made by the provisions of the Federal reserve act relating to the minimum of capital required for the organization of reserve banks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GLASS. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to insert in the RECORD at this point the poll of banks as to preferences for reserve-bank cities, as taken by the organization committee, and to which I have heretofore made reference:

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, I venture to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in order that I may insert in the RECORD, for the information of the Members, an official statement from the regional reserve bank organization committee as to why it located banks in certain cities.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following is the statement referred to:

STATEMENT GIVEN OUT TO-DAY BY THE RESERVE BANK ORGANIZATION COMMITTEE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 19, 1914.

Congress imposed on the committee the duty of dividing the country into not less than 8 nor more than 12 districts, and the location of a Federal reserve bank in each. Thirty-seven cities asked to be chosen. The committee could select at most only 12. Necessarily 25 cities had to be disappointed.

Following its policy declared at the very outset, the committee refused to be influenced by the purely local and selfish claims of cities or individuals, and discharged the duty imposed upon it by Congress after exhaustive investigation and study of the entire country, with unbiased minds, and according to its best judgment. With so many conflicting claims somebody had to judge. Congress constituted the committee a court and gave the Federal Reserve Board the power of review. Disappointed competitors should seek a remedy through the orderly processes the law prescribes.

Considerable comment has been occasioned by the failure of the committee to create districts suggested by New Orleans, with New Orleans as the location for a reserve bank; by Baltimore, with Baltimore as the location for a reserve bank; by Omaha, with Omaha as the location for a reserve bank; and by Denver, with Denver as the location for a reserve bank.

The committee realized that the division of the country into districts was far more important and complex than the designation of the reserve cities, and that the latter duty was subsidiary and relatively simple, waiving considerations of local pride or prestige. In arranging the districts the consideration of the character and growth of industry, trade, and banking, no less than the traditions, habits, and common understandings of the people was much more intimately involved.

It became clear in the hearings that comparatively few people realized, or seemed to realize, what the act was intended to accomplish, what the nature and functions of the reserve banks were to be, and how little change would occur in the ordinary financial relations of the communities, the business establishments, and the individual banks.

Critics of the decision of the committee reveal misunderstanding in these directions and either do not know, or appear not to know, that the Federal reserve banks are bankers' banks and not ordinary commercial banks; that they are to hold the reserves and to clear the checks of member banks, make rediscounts for them, and engage in certain open market operations. As a matter of fact, the ordinary everyday banking relations of the community of business men and of banks will not be greatly modified or altered. The purpose of the system is to remove artificiality, promote normal relations, and create better conditions under which everybody will transact business.

Every city can continue to do business with individuals, firms, or corporations within its own limits or in its own region or in any other part of the Union or the world in which it has heretofore done business.

Reserves are to be held in a new way and in new places so far as this act controls them, but banking and business generally will no more be confined within districts than heretofore, and it is simply misleading for any city or individual to represent that the future of a city will be injuriously affected by reason of its failure to secure a Federal reserve bank. Every city which has the foundations for prosperity and progress will continue to grow and expand, whether it has such a reserve bank or not, and well-informed bankers especially are aware of this.

The facts which the committee had to consider will throw light on its decision in reference to these cities.

NEW ORLEANS CLAIMS.

New Orleans selected a district extending from New Mexico to the Atlantic Ocean, including all of Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, Georgia, and that part of Tennessee south of the Tennessee River.

It was represented by Texas that it would do great violence to her trade to connect her with New Orleans. It was claimed, and evidence was submitted in support of the claim, that her trade was with her own cities or with Kansas City and St. Louis. In a poll of the banks of Texas made by the Comptroller of the Currency 212 banks expressed a first choice, 121 a second choice, and 30 a third choice for Dallas. No bank in Texas expressed a first choice for New Orleans, only 4 a second choice, and 44 a third choice. The whole State protested against being related to New Orleans.

The banks of Alabama generally desired to be connected either with Birmingham or Atlanta, only three expressing a first choice for New Orleans. The banks of Georgia desired to be connected with Atlanta, none expressing a first or second choice for New Orleans, and only 12 a third choice. They represented that it would do violence to them to be connected with a city to the west, and claimed that their relations were mainly with Atlanta or cities to the northeast. Of 44 banks in Florida, 19 gave Atlanta as their first choice, 19 as their second choice, and 5 as their third choice. Only 5 expressed a first preference for New Orleans, and these were in the western corner, 4 a second choice, and 3 a third choice. No bank in Tennessee expressed a first or second choice for New Orleans, and only 2 a third choice, while 7 expressed a first choice for Atlanta, 14 a second choice, and 13 a third choice. Generally speaking, the only banks desired to be connected with New Orleans, and expressed a first preference for her, were 25 of the 26 banks reporting in Louisiana and 19 of the 32 in Mississippi. On a poll made from the comptroller's office of all banks expressing their preference as to the location for a Federal reserve city, 124 expressed a first preference for Atlanta, 232 for Dallas, and only 52 for New Orleans. The views of the bankers were supported by chambers of commerce, other business organizations, and by many business men.

It will thus be seen that if the committee was to give weight to the views of business men and bankers in the section of the country affected; to consider the opposition to the States of Texas, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, and Tennessee; and to be guided by economic considerations, it could not have designated New Orleans as the location for a reserve bank to serve either the western or the eastern part of the district the city asked for. The course of business is not from the Atlantic seaboard toward New Orleans, nor largely from the State of Texas to that city, and if Dallas and Atlanta had been related to New Orleans a better-grounded complaint could and would have been lodged by them against the committee's decision than that made by New Orleans.

Some of the banking statistics which the committee had to consider throw light on the problem. It should be borne in mind that the committee could consider primarily only the statistics with reference to assenting banks. In this section of the country, as in most others, the assenting banks were the national banks. In March, 1914, the capital stock and surplus, loans and discounts, and individual deposits of the national banks in the three cities named, as shown by the sworn reports to the Comptroller of the Currency, were as follows:

	Capital and surplus.	Loans and discounts.	Individual deposits.
Atlanta	$8,600,000	$26,038,000	$24,348,000
Dallas	5,900,000	18,622,000	18,551,000
New Orleans	6,730,000	17,285,000	16,857,000

Even more significant are the statistics of growth from September, 1904, to March, 1914:

CAPITAL AND SURPLUS.

	September, 1904.	March, 1914.	Percentage of increase.
Atlanta	$2,410,000	$8,600,000	253
Dallas	2,676,000	5,900,000	120
New Orleans	6,250,000	6,730,000	8

LOANS AND DISCOUNTS.

Atlanta	$10,329,000	$26,038,000	152
Dallas	7,653,000	18,622,000	143
New Orleans	20,088,000	17,285,000	[1]13

INDIVIDUAL DEPOSITS.

Atlanta	$9,931,000	$23,348,000	145
Dallas	7,157,000	18,551,000	159
New Orleans	19,425,000	16,857,000	[1]13

[1] Decrease.

The loans and discounts in the national banks of New Orleans at the time of the report, March 4, 1914, were less than those of the national banks of either Atlanta or Dallas

While the committee could not figure on the resources of other than assenting banks which are in this section, the national banks, the following statistics of all reporting banks, including national banks, State banks, and trust companies, as of June 4, 1913, were regarded as significant and were given consideration:

Atlanta reported capital stock and surplus, $15,313,000, or $98 per capita; Dallas, $9,997,000, or $108 per capita; and New Orleans, $20,532,000, or $60 per capita. Individual deposits, per capita, Atlanta, $183; Dallas, $269; New Orleans, $209.

The loans and discounts for all reporting banks for the three cities were as follows: Atlanta, $33,494,000, or $216 per capita; Dallas, $27,517,000, or $299 per capita; New Orleans, $64,845,000, or $194 per capita.

The committee found that the total loans and discounts made by national banks in the cities named in the 13 Southern States on January 13, 1914, were as follows:

Atlanta	$26,117,000
Dallas	19,123,000
New Orleans	19,477,000

While the total loans made by the national banks of Dallas throughout the entire United States on the date mentioned exceeded the loans made by the national banks of New Orleans.

Special reports made under oath to the Comptroller of the Currency also show that on February 14, 1914, the credit balances of the banks and trust companies in the 13 Southern States with the national banks of Dallas exceeded in amount the credit balances of all banks and trust companies in these same States with the national banks of New Orleans.

In view of the comparisons and criticisms from New Orleans in connection with the designation of Dallas, Atlanta, and Richmond, and the omission of New Orleans and Baltimore, the following table is instructive.

National bank statistics for States of Texas, Virginia, Maryland, Georgia, Louisiana, and Mississippi as of Mar. 4, 1914, according to sworn reports made to the Comptroller of the Currency.

	Area, square miles.	Population, census 1910.	Capital and surplus.	Individual deposits.	Loans and discounts.
State of Texas (including Dallas)	265,780	3,896,542	$76,785,584	$197,663,338	$215,114,326
State of Virginia (including Richmond)	42,450	2,061,612	29,732,696	90,887,858	107,410,063
State of Maryland (including Baltimore)	12,210	1,295,346	28,267,420	83,217,376	91,326,942
State of Georgia (including Atlanta)	59,475	2,609,121	24,479,735	51,382,061	61,852,579
State of Louisiana (including New Orleans)	48,720	1,656,388	12,128,866	32,000,521	34,804,354
State of Mississippi	46,810	1,797,114	5,168,192	17,045,324	13,669,200

From the above statement it will be seen that in each item—capital and surplus, individual deposits, and loans and discounts—the national banks of Virginia, including Richmond, largely surpass the national banks of Maryland, including Baltimore.

The capital and surplus of the national banks of the State of Virginia are 60 per cent greater than the capital and surplus of the national banks of the States of Louisiana and Mississippi combined, including the city of New Orleans, while the loans and discounts by the national banks of Virginia are more than three times as great as the loans and discounts in the national banks of Louisiana, including New Orleans.

While the capital and surplus of the national banks of Georgia largely exceed the combined capital and surplus of the national banks of the States of both Mississippi and Louisiana, the loans and discounts made by the national banks of Georgia exceed by $13,000,000 the loans and discounts of all the national banks of Louisiana and Mississippi combined, including the city of New Orleans.

The capital and surplus of the national banks of Texas amount to four times as much as the capital and surplus of the national banks of the States of Louisiana and Mississippi combined, and the individual deposits in the national banks of Texas also amount to about four times as much as the individual deposits of all national banks in Louisiana and Mississippi, the only States from which New Orleans received as much as half a dozen votes as first choice for the location for a Federal reserve bank.

KANSAS CITY DISTRICT.

The region in the Middle and Far West presented problems of difficulty. Careful consideration was given to the claims of Omaha, Lincoln, Denver, and Kansas City, which conflicted in this region. Denver asked for a district which included Idaho, Montana, Utah, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, and the eastern two-thirds of Arizona and Texas, Kansas, and Nebraska west of the one hundredth meridian, and the Deadwood portion of South Dakota. The district gave approximately the minimum capital provided by law. Of the territory included in this district Montana unanimously requested to be connected with Minneapolis or Chicago, saying that she had little or no trade relations with Denver. Idaho desired to go to Portland or San Francisco; Arizona preferred San Francisco, and the greater part of New Mexico asked for Kansas City. Western Texas, Kansas, and Nebraska unanimously protested against going to Denver. Kansas desired Kansas City; Nebraska preferred Omaha or Lincoln; and Texas wanted either a Texas city or Kansas City or St. Louis.

In the poll of banks Denver received 136 first-choice votes, of which 112 were from Colorado and 12 from Wyoming. With Montana, Idaho, Arizona, Texas, Kansas, and Nebraska in opposition, it was clearly impossible to make a district with Denver as the location of a bank. Part of the territory asked to be assigned to San Francisco and the other part to Minneapolis or Kansas City.

Omaha asked for a district embracing western Iowa, all of Nebraska, part of South Dakota, part of Kansas, Colorado, Utah, Wyoming, Idaho, and Montana. All but eight of the banks in South Dakota insisted upon being connected with Minneapolis; Iowa desired to go to Chicago; Kansas practically unanimously voted for Kansas City; Montana protested against any other connection than Minneapolis or Chicago. The preferences of the other States have already been indicated.

Of the 218 banks which expressed a first preference for Omaha, 181 were from Nebraska. The committee had to consider the State of Oklahoma and part of Missouri in connection with this region, and in district No. 10, 497 banks expressed a first preference for Kansas City; western Missouri, Oklahoma, and Kansas, and part of New Mexico especially asked for this connection. Thirty-seven banks in Colorado gave Kansas City as second choice and 26 gave Omaha.

It seemed impossible to serve the great section from Kansas City to the mountains in any other way than by creating a district with Kansas City as the headquarters, or to provide for the northwestern section except by creating a district with Minneapolis as headquarters. The only other thing that could have been done with Nebraska under the conditions which presented themselves was to relate her to Chicago, and this seemed to be inadvisable in the circumstances. The Kansas City banks serve a very distinctive territory and will serve it more satisfactorily than St. Louis could have done. The relations of that territory on the whole are much more largely with Kansas City than with any other city in the Middle West with which it could have been connected. It will, of course, be recognized by those who are informed that of the four cities Kansas City is the most dominant banking and business center. The following statistics as of March, 1914, will throw light on the situation:

	Capital and surplus.	Loans and discounts.	Individual deposits.
Kansas City	$11,660,000	$66,205,000	$40,415,000
Omaha	6,570,000	32,848,000	27,258,000
Denver	7,545,000	28,022,000	34,124,000
Lincoln	1,330,000	6,066,000	4,439,000

The statistics of growth during the nine years from September, 1904, to March, 1914, are significant:

CAPITAL AND SURPLUS.

	September, 1904.	March, 1914.	Percentage of increase.
Kansas City	$3,900,000	$11,660,000	199
Omaha	3,880,000	6,570,000	69
Denver	3,325,000	7,545,000	127
Lincoln	768,000	1,330,000	73

LOANS AND DISCOUNTS.

Kansas City	$35,598,000	$66,205,000	86
Omaha	16,218,00	32,848,000	102
Denver	14,146,000	28,022,000	98
Lincoln	3,820,000	6,066,000	58

INDIVIDUAL DEPOSITS.

Kansas City	$30,730,000	$40,415,000	31
Omaha	15,728,000	27,258,000	73
Denver	27,798,000	34,124,000	22
Lincoln	3,283,000	4,439,000	35

The loans and discounts of all reporting banks and trust companies in Kansas City on June 4, 1913, amounted to $91,686,000, exceeding by about $7,000,000 the total loans and discounts of all banks and trust companies in the cities of Omaha, Denver, and Lincoln combined.

The loans and discounts of the national banks alone in Kansas City also exceeded the sum total of the loans and discounts of all national banks in the cities of Omaha and Denver combined.

The great preponderance in the movement of trade in district No. 10 is to the east. In order to place the Federal reserve bank for that region in Denver it would have been necessary to disregard these facts and the opposition and earnest protests of banks, both National and State, throughout the district.

THE RICHMOND DISTRICT.

The committee named as cities for the location of Federal reserve banks New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Boston, and Cleveland. In population these are the six largest cities in the United States; their geographical situation and all other considerations fully justified their selection.

San Francisco and Minneapolis were the first choice of the great majority of the national banks in their respective sections, and their financial, industrial, and commercial relations and other factors entitled them to be chosen. Their selection appears to have evoked no criticism, but to have received general approval. Conditions relating to the Kansas City, Dallas, and Atlanta districts have been dealt with.

For the territory from eastern Georgia to the Pennsylvania line the committee, after fully considering all the facts, decided to create a district, with the Federal reserve bank at Richmond. South Carolina and North Carolina had protested against being connected with a bank to the South or West. They said that their course of trade was northeast. It seemed undesirable to place a bank in the extreme northeastern corner or at Baltimore, not only because of its proximity to Philadelphia but also because of the industrial and banking relations of the greater part of the district were more intimate with Richmond than with either Washington or Baltimore. The States of Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North and South Carolina, and the District of Columbia had to be considered. North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia preferred to be connected with Richmond. West Virginia was divided in its preferences; Maryland and the District of Columbia, of course, desired Baltimore or Washington. In the poll of banks made directly by the Comptroller's office, Richmond received more first-choice ballots than any other city in the district, 167, against 128 for Baltimore, 35 for Pittsburgh, 28 for Columbia, S. C., 37 for Cincinnati, and 25 for Washington, D. C. Of the remaining 21 votes, 19 were for Charlotte, N. C., and 2 for New York. Leaving out the States of Maryland and Virginia, Richmond received from the rest of the district three times as many first-choice votes as were cast for Baltimore

District No. 5 is composed of the States of Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia (except four counties), North and South Carolina, and the District of Columbia. These States have always been closely bound together commercially and financially, and their business dealings are large and intimate. The reports made to the Comptroller of the Currency on March 4, 1914, by all the national banks in each of these States show in every essential respect that the business of the national banks in Virginia, including Richmond, is greater than the business of the national banks of Maryland, including Baltimore, or any other of the five States embraced in district No. 5, as appears in the following table:

	Capital, surplus, and undivided profits.	Loans and discounts.	Total individual deposits
Virginia	$33,544,631	$107,410,063	$90,887,858
Maryland	31,390,057	91,326,942	83,217,376
West Virginia	18,209,346	56,789,538	61,421,332
North Carolina	13,527,086	44,051,033	36,051,154
South Carolina	10,332,439	28,860,456	23,330,016
District of Columbia	12,685,411	26,253,432	29,520,053

Advocates of New Orleans have criticized the decision of the organization committee and have given out comparative figures as to New Orleans, Richmond, and other cities, which are incorrect and misleading. An analysis and study of the actual figures will be found instructive and can lend no support to the claims of New Orleans.

From the sworn special reports recently submitted to the Comptroller of the Currency it appears that the national banks in Richmond were lending in the 13 Southern States on January 13, 1914, more money than was being loaned in those States by the national banks of any other city in the country except New York. The total loans and discounts in the 13 Southern States by the four cities referred to are as follows:

Richmond	$33,473,000
Baltimore	6,891,000
New Orleans	19,477,000
Washington	915,000

The figures also show that in these portions of district No. 5, outside of the States of Virginia and Maryland, the Richmond national banks are lending twice as much money as all the national banks in Baltimore and Washington combined. They also show that although Richmond is not a reserve city, the banks and trust companies in the 13 Southern States had on deposit in the national banks of Richmond on February 14, 1914, $9,876,000, or slightly more than the banks of this section had on deposit in the city of Baltimore, and four times as much as they carried in Washington, although these two cities have long enjoyed the benefits of being reserve cities. That southern banks should carry larger balances in Richmond where they could not be counted in their reserves, rather than in Baltimore, or Washington, where they could be counted, is suggestive.

The figures show that the capital and surplus of all reporting banks—national, State, and savings—and trust companies, per capita, in Richmond, as of June 4, 1913, was $131; in Baltimore, $85; in Washington, $88; and in New Orleans, $60, while the loans and discounts made by all banks and trust companies in Richmond on the same date amounted to $393 per capita, against $190 in Washington, $213 in Baltimore, and $194 in New Orleans.

The amount of money which banks and trust companies in the various parts of the country carried on deposit with Richmond—a non-reserve city—on February 14, 1914, amounted to $10,970,000, or nearly twice as much as the balances carried by outside banks with the national banks of Washington, which on the same day amounted to $5,516,000, and one and a half times as much as they carried on the same day with the national banks of New Orleans—a reserve city.

The statistics furnished the organization committee shows that on March 4, 1914, the capital and surplus of the national banks of Richmond, per capita, amounted to more than twice as much as the capital and surplus, per capita, of the national banks of either Baltimore or Washington and three and a half times as much as New Orleans, while the individual deposits of the national banks of Richmond amounted to $201 per capita, against $85 for Washington and $76 for Baltimore and $50 for New Orleans. The loans and discounts in the national banks of Richmond on the same date were reported at $279 per capita, against $77 for Washington and $108 for Baltimore and $51 for New Orleans.

Especially significant are the following statistics, showing the growth in capital and surplus, loans and discounts, and individual deposits of national banks in the three cities named:

CAPITAL AND SURPLUS.

	September, 1904.	March, 1914.	Percentage of increase.
Richmond	$3,115,000	$9,314,392	199
Washington	6,215,000	11,365,000	83
Baltimore	18,262,900	19,205,900	5
New Orleans	6,250,000	6,730,000	8

LOANS AND DISCOUNTS.

Richmond	$12,946,000	$35,593,000	175
Washington	15,018,000	25,405,000	69
Baltimore	48,755,000	60,312,000	23
New Orleans	20,088,000	17,285,000	[1]13

INDIVIDUAL DEPOSITS.

Richmond	$11,257,000	$25,705,000	128
Washington	20,017,000	28,491,000	42
Baltimore	40,910,000	42,553,000	4
New Orleans	19,425,000	16,857,000	13

[1] Decrease.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, under leave to revise and extend my remarks I shall insert in the RECORD the brief prepared by the Richmond committee having in hand the presentation of Richmond's claim to a regional reserve bank:

RICHMOND AS THE LOCATION OF A FEDERAL RESERVE BANK.

[A brief prepared by George J. Seay on behalf of the committee representing Richmond.]

The territory mapped out by nature as the most perfect geographical division of this continent lies south of the Potomac River, east of the Appalachian Mountains, and extends to the Gulf. By reason of superior facilities of communication and the consequent trade relations which have sprung up and become established, portions of contiguous States are now and long have been commercially allied with this territory.

It is therefore believed that one of the most sharply defined and perfect zones for the operation of a Federal reserve bank is embraced in the following-named States: Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, the southern half of West Virginia, part of eastern Tennessee, and part of eastern Kentucky.

Since the organization committee has at all of its hearings sought and invited the expression of opinion, we now desire to express the conviction that the committee can render an inestimable service to the country, the value of which will grow with time, by defining the Federal reserve-bank zones in harmony with commercial zones determined by natural boundaries, so far as may be done in agreement with the act.

It has been recognized as desirable, for purposes of economic comparison, to cut the country into units or divisions.

Given a natural division of territory, the conditions in it, financial and commercial, must always be more uniform than could otherwise be the case.

The comptroller has adopted six divisions within State lines.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, for comparison of the operations of railways, has made 10 arbitrary divisions within State lines.

Poor's Manual, a very high railroad authority of very long experience, makes eight divisions within State lines.

The United States Government has established nine judicial circuits, one of which comprises the States of Maryland, West Virginia, Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina. Richmond was selected as the location of the court of appeals for this circuit, and the chief justice sits here.

There are no standard divisions.

Comparisons by States will always be desirable and necessary, but these divisions are too numerous for economic purposes.

The Federal reserve act marks an epoch in the commercial and financial history of the United States, and while zones once determined may be readjusted the service which can now be rendered to the country by the committee in fixing these zones, which need not be coterminous with States, and therefore are contemplated to be according to the natural divisions and trade relations of the country, is of the very highest order.

In fixing the zone which we have mapped out we have been guided by this principle, and in presenting an argument to prove that Richmond can better serve this zone than any other city in it, and that by reason of her commercial and financial preeminence she is entitled to be the location of a Federal reserve bank, we have endeavored to eliminate all irrelevant matter and have confined ourselves to the consideration of the following points, all of which are involved in the operation of the act:

1. The importance of Richmond's geographical position, her facilities of communication, her convenience of location and accessibility to members with whom we now do business, and her advantage of location in all banking transactions between the North and the South.

2. The present trend of business, the present course of commercial transactions, the natural currents of exchange, the present banking and trade connections, and banking customs of the people.

3. The natural advantages of Richmond's location with relation to other Federal reserve banks necessary to be established on the Atlantic seaboard, in a territory embracing one-half of the national banking capital of the United States and 41 per cent of the population.

4. Comparative commercial importance in the territory covered, measured by capital, deposits, and other banking transactions.

5. Diversity of industries and agriculture—in their effect upon seasonal demand for credit and currency.

6. Necessity of having capital resources to handle the business of the district.

7. The wishes and views of those engaged in banking and commerce in the district outlined as to the location of their regional bank.

In presenting our case we shall be compelled to state facts and figures which we know to be within the knowledge of the committee, and with which by now we fear they may be surfeited. We desire to bring these facts together and present them in such form and manner as will serve for convenient reference and to make more clear their relations to each other and their bearing upon our position.

Addressing ourselves to these facts in their order:

1. THE UNSURPASSED ADVANTAGE OF RICHMOND IN GEOGRAPHICAL POSITION.

Practically and effectively on the Atlantic seaboard, about midway of the entire coast; reaping the greatest advantage of the favoring curve; opposite the gap in the Appalachian Mountains, giving the shortest, easiest, and quickest communication between the coast and the great centers of the Middle West; within one hour and a half of the greatest of Atlantic harbors, plans being now under way to make it the greatest naval base; in quick communication by rail and water with all other parts of the coast, and easily accessible to the ocean commerce of the world. Rear Admiral Stanford has just made the following report on this harbor:

"The most frequent mobilizations of the fleet are in Hampton Roads, and large ships ordinarily assigned to other yards must pass this point proceeding to and from the Gulf to the West Indies. In view of this central location, and the use of Hampton Roads as a base of operations, there is greater possibility of unforeseen repairs being required for vessels than at any other coast point."

Richmond's three north-and-south trunk lines—the Atlantic Coast Line, the Seaboard Air Line, and the Southern Railway; and we may be pardoned for reminding the committee that the genius, brains, and energies of Richmond men were very prominent in the development of the last two and are prominent in the management of the first.

Two of the most important east-and-west trunk lines—the Chesapeake & Ohio and the Norfolk & Western—connect Richmond with the finest coal area in the world and the greatest natural producing area on this continent, while into Norfolk, within two hours and a half travel from Richmond, run the Virginian Railway from the West and the Norfolk & Southern from the South.

All of which is well known to you, but necessary to be stated for the logical bearing of our argument.

We wish to impress upon the committee the natural advantages of the territory surrounding Hampton Roads, because it is generally regarded as inevitable that the heaviest population of the State will be divided between Richmond and that territory. Mr. O. P. Austin, for 15 years Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Commerce, in a report on the zone which we have mapped out, which report fully confirms our own argument and position and accompanies this brief, refers to "the possibilities of the great harbor at Hampton Roads becoming the natural gateway for the Mississippi Valley, with its enormous production for foreign markets and consumption of foreign merchandise." He also states that "the officers of the War Department in charge of the 105 river and harbor works on the water frontage from the upper Potomac to the western coast of Florida report the value of the water-borne freight traffic at these places in 1912 at the enormous sum of $1,680,000,000, about one-half of which is at Hampton Roads."

We believe that this region must and will have an economic development which will far surpass any equal area in the Atlantic States, all of which has a practical and most intimate bearing upon Richmond as the location of a Federal reserve bank for the South Atlantic States.

Reverting to Richmond's railroad facilities—they place her within 18 hours of all the important cities within the district defined, with the exception of part of the most southern territory, and reference is made to the map and time table accompanying.

She is therefore in a position to ship with the greatest promptness and under the quickest schedule currency, not only to the banks in her zone, but to the numerous cotton, tobacco, and peanut buyers, and a telegram received in Richmond before the close of banking hours would enable currency shipments to reach practically all important points on the next day, in most cases before the opening of bank, and few situations will appeal more strongly to practical country bankers than this.

Again, Richmond is within easier and quicker reach of all the eastern centers of trade and finance than any other important southern city, and is in the most exceptional position to act for the North in banking relations with the South, and for the South in dealing with the North.

No other city in the Atlantic Coast States occupies this advantageous position.

The numerous lines to the South and West are not only a guaranty of promptness and efficiency, but an insurance against disaster.

Into Washington and Baltimore and on to points beyond there is only one connecting line.

It is worth while to consider that a railway disaster, easily imaginable, to this line would cut off the South from any reserve centers placed north of Richmond, and should this occur at a critical time might cause financial confusion and even disaster to the South Atlantic States, and since this idea emanates from a railroad man, it is entitled to the greater consideration.

2. PRESENT TREND OF BUSINESS.

It is a fact, certainly applicable to the Atlantic Coast States, that the trend of business, the course of commercial transactions, and the currents of exchange are northward, or, in other words, from the outside toward the centers of finance and manufacture. This is the natural course of exchanges.

We believe that the operation of the Federal reserve act will revolutionize the existing method of using exchange in making settlements.

No act or rule will, however, reverse the natural course of settlements—where the money is due, there it must be paid.

Virginia, occupying the position of head of the Southern States, places Richmond in direct line with this natural trend, on the principal avenues of travel and transportation.

The railway lines from the South come into Virginia as into a funnel, Richmond being at the apex—the one line of railway being the tube leading to Washington and points North. She is a natural converging point.

The overwhelming volume of travel and transportation must go through this point.

3. THE NATURAL ADVANTAGES OF RICHMOND'S LOCATION WITH REFERENCE TO OTHER FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS ON THE ATLANTIC SEABOARD.

It is plainly contemplated in the act, and must so work out in its normal operation, that these Federal banks will act not only as clearing houses for members in their own zones, but between zones. The clearings between zones we believe will develop into enormous proportions, and the bank most advantageously located for clearing the transactions of any large section of country will have a great service to perform.

Time and distance must necessarily be most important factors in determining the location and selection of this bank for such a purpose.

To best perform it, the means of communication must be superior.

The bank should not only be readily accessible to members in its own district, but in the general line of trade and natural current of banking transactions of the entire section, so as to preserve the continuous trend toward the center of manufacture and finance where the greatest volume of settlements is made.

This essential principle is peculiarly applicable to the Atlantic Coast States, and can there be worked out to greater economic advantage than in any other part of the country.

It is axiomatic that quickness of communication is better assured by being on the lines of greatest frequency of travel, and all railroad schedules have been arranged with regard to the northward trend and with particular reference to the financial and business centers in line with that trend.

Therefore, to serve its own zone as a whole with the highest efficiency and economy, and at the same time to equally serve other zones in intimate relation with its own zone, a point midway along the line of quickest and most frequent communication offers the ideal location, and Providence has placed Richmond in that position.

The Atlantic Coast States afford a distinct and peculiar problem in putting into effect the Federal reserve act.

It was recognized both before and during the framing of and debate upon the act that the problem in the East was to decentralize reserves, while the object in other parts of the country is to concentrate them.

The States bordering on the Atlantic coast have about 41 per cent of the population and 52 per cent of the national banking capital of the country, as follows:

[Figures in millions.]

New England States:
Maine	11
Vermont	7
New Hampshire	9
Massachusetts	96
Connecticut	31
Rhode Island	11
Total	165
Eastern States:
New York	344
Pennsylvania	253
New Jersey	46
Delaware	3
Maryland	29
Total	675
Southern States:
Virginia	29
North Carolina	11
South Carolina	8
Georgia	25
Florida	11
Total	84

Total, $924,000,000, or about 52 per cent of the national-banking capital of the United States.

In giving our views upon this situation, we are doing, as we understand it, only that which the committee invites us to do, as before stated, and chiefly because it has an intimate relation with our own case. We therefore assume that the Atlantic Coast States, where the banking capital essential to the operation of the system is heavily concentrated, are entitled to and perhaps must have several reserve banks, located according to the density of banking operations, so as to carry out the purpose and spirit of the act and not disrupt or disturb the natural course of business and financial settlements.

It is accordingly natural to assume, as we look upon it, that the greatest cities in that section will receive the first consideration, and these cities are, of course, in geographical order: Boston, New York, and Philadelphia. And if the selection of these cities will, as we believe, best accomplish the division of banking power aimed at, then a Federal reserve bank can not, in justice to the rest of the country and without doing violence to the purpose of the act, be located in any other near-by city.

Among the 15 Atlantic Coast States named, Virginia ranks sixth. These 6 States rank in the order named—New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Connecticut, Virginia.

But Virginia exceeds Connecticut in national bank gross deposits by $40,000,000.

Virginia therefore ranks fifth in national banking importance among the 15 States.

For this reason, as well as for her geographical position, it follows that it is natural to look to Virginia to furnish the next location for a Federal reserve bank along the Atlantic coast, and again we affirm that a Federal reserve bank in Richmond will have the most decided advantage over any point in these Atlantic Coast States in clearing for member banks and reserve banks between the North and South, and no other location can offer such practical advantages in economy of time which, according to the accepted adage, is synonymous with money.

One day's interest on the annual volume of exchanges between the northern and southern banks would mean a handsome profit to the Government. This one advantage alone is of such overwhelming importance that it justifies our statement that Richmond's natural advantage of location can not be overcome by any other consideration. It is difficult to name a feature of equal economic importance to the gain of a banking day in perpetuity.

It cuts the year in half, or doubles its length, according to whether it is operating for or against any point or points. Richmond would have that advantage over other large cities north of her in effecting these clearings between zones in the Atlantic States.

4. COMPARATIVE COMMERCIAL IMPORTANCE.

As to the comparative commercial importance of Richmond, and of Virginia, with relation to this district, measured by capital, deposits, and banking transactions—

Of the 15 Atlantic Coast States, Virginia, as we have stated, ranks fifth in natural banking importance.

There are only three other States on this side of the Mississippi which exceed Virginia in national banking capital; that is, Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio.

Among the 26 States on this side of the Mississippi, Virginia, therefore, ranks eighth in importance in the present national banking system, measured by that standard.

She stands financially, as well as geographically, at the head of all the Southern States east of the Mississippi River.

The aggregate national-bank resources of these several States are as follows (comptroller's figures, Oct. 21, 1913):

Virginia	$168,000,000
West Virginia	92,000,000
North Carolina	70,000,000
South Carolina	49,000,000
Georgia	113,000,000
Florida	61,000,000
Alabama	80,000,000
Mississippi	27,000,000
Louisiana	80,000,000
Tennessee	115,000,000

Virginia therefore leads by $53,000,000 the State next highest in rank. Virginia maintains the same supremacy in the entire banking field.

The deposits in all classes of banks in these States are as follows:

Virginia	$175,000,000
North Carolina	106,000,000
South Carolina	75,000,000
Georgia	152,000,000
Florida	76,000,000
Alabama	96,000,000
Mississippi	76,000,000
Louisiana	147,000,000
Tennessee	156,000,000

Virginia leads by about $20,000,000 the State next highest in rank among the Southern States east of the Mississippi River.

As to Richmond, the national-bank deposits of Richmond are two-fifths of such deposits in the entire State, while her national banking capital is three-fifths of that of the State.

Richmond is not a reserve city under the national banking law, and Virginia has no reserve city.

Her bank deposits have not been built up because of any inducements which other competing cities do not offer.

She is a natural reserve city.

The law governing Virginia State banks requires no specified amount of liabilities to be kept either in vault or in other banks.

The business of Richmond has flowed to her from other Virginia points and from Southern and Western States as a result of natural causes governed by the trend of business, the numerous and unexcelled means of communication as well as by the attraction of capital.

The industrial and commercial relations and needs of this section have developed these banking relations.

The customary trend of business, free from all extraneous compelling influences, has developed these relations, and the established custom of keeping checking accounts has simply grown up as a natural result of everyday business transactions.

It is to be considered that the Federal reserve act will, with its new principles of credit and reserve, clearing and par of exchange, alter in a great measure the banking customs and practices which have grown up under the old law, and may, and probably will, revolutionize some of the practices of banking.

The trend and flow of exchanges will be altered to the extent that they have become artificial, and to the extent that they have been influenced by the location of reserve centers, the requirements of keeping reserve accounts, and the custom of sustaining balances in order to command credit.

It is altogether probable that results in many cases will be of an astonishing nature.

It is one of the purposes of the act to promote free banking relations, and under free banking relations it is clearly a justifiable conclusion that the service Richmond will have to perform will be a greater one because of being a natural trade, transportation, and banking center. The law of physics is the law of commerce—it will follow the lines of least resistance. We will develop this point further on.

To further illustrate the natural flow of business to Virginia and Richmond—

The national banks of Richmond on Oct. 21, 1913, had deposits from other national banks of	$7,500,000
Deposits from other State banks, etc	10,000,000
Total	17,500,000
Which compares with corresponding totals for—
Georgia	9,700,000
North Carolina	8,200,000
South Carolina	6,200,000

These deposits were exceeded by no other Southern State east of the Mississippi River.

Illustrating the rapid growth and concentration of banking capital, the resources of Richmond banks were in—

1890	$14,000,000
1903	32,000,000
1913	74,000,000

Her clearings in—

1900	175,000,000
1912	424,000,000

Richmond ranks in bank clearings among the first 30 cities in the United States, and compares with other southern cities as follows:

Washington	$387,000,000
Richmond	424,000,000
Atlanta	693,000,000

In the case of Richmond these clearings were for the city alone, while in the case of Atlanta they cover the State, with its 117 national and 669 State banks, with a few exceptions, and, as we understand, also points in adjoining States; and, furthermore, in addition to her local clearings, Richmond handled $400,000,000 in checks and drafts on the Southern States named, making her clearings on the same principle, as we think, practically $800,000,000.

Richmond's banking relations with States south of her show the great intimacy of trade relations with these States, and the statement following sets forth in the most illuminating manner the custom and trend of business under existing conditions and notwithstanding the present system of bank reserves:

[From comptroller's report of 1912.]

Number of State and National banks in—
Virginia	380
North Carolina	429
South Carolina	346
West Virginia	297
Georgia	760
Florida	204
Number of accounts carried in Richmond by banks from—
Virginia	528
North Carolina	397
South Carolina	182
West Virginia	82
Georgia	85
Florida	18
Maximum deposits carried by other banks in Richmond—
Virginia	$5,467,697
North Carolina	4,465,455
South Carolina	926,779
West Virginia	1,793,838
Georgia	440,115
Florida	142,918
Maximum loans by Richmond to other banks in 1913—
Virginia	1,459,080
North Carolina	2,200,480
South Carolina	2,423,915
West Virginia	90,700
Georgia	669,900
Florida	79,750
Maximum deposits in Richmond to credit of individuals, firms, and corporations in—
North Carolina	3,225,369
South Carolina	1,416,997
Maximum loans made in Richmond in 1913 to individuals, firms, and corporations in—
North Carolina	5,245,451
South Carolina	3,129,815
Maximum deposits of banks and individuals outside of Virginia in Richmond banks—
North Carolina	7,690,820
South Carolina	2,343,776
Maximum loans by Richmond to banks and individuals in—
North Carolina	7,445,931
South Carolina	5,553,730

So that banks, corporations, and individuals outside of Richmond carried on deposit in Richmond banks $18,000,000.

It will be observed that in Virginia the number of bank accounts with Richmond greatly exceeds the number of banks in the State.

In North Carolina it nearly equals the number of banks, and in South Carolina and West Virginia the number of accounts in proportion to the number of banks is very large.

Richmond's loans to other Southern States and to individuals and corporations in these States aggregated nearly $14,000,000, a sum not far short of the aggregate borrowings and rediscounts on October 21, 1913, of national banks in any six Southern States, excluding Texas.

Richmond lends practically all of this capital in the South outside of Virginia. She does not use it herself.

She is a credit clearing house.

To meet the demands for crop and other purposes Richmond, during 1913, shipped $14,000,000 in currency into this section.

In the volume of corporate capital, upon the income of which Virginia pays to the Government a tax, she ranks easily first among all the Southern States:

Virginia	$942,000,000
Texas	873,000,000
Georgia	485,000,000

The amount Virginia pays to the support of the Government in internal revenue taxes is exceeded only by that of the State of North Carolina among all the Southern States:

Virginia	$8,300,000
North Carolina	8,900,000
Georgia	541,000
Alabama	338,000
Louisiana	5,000,000
Tennessee	2,300,000

These comparisons are not given simply to show the commercial importance of the State of Virginia and of the city of Richmond, but rather to set forth the volume of business transactions centered in Richmond out of which grow banking transactions and customs of trade and trend of commerce and exchanges and exchange of credits.

The jobbing and the manufacturing business of Richmond are further practical illustrations that she is a trading and distributing center. Her jobbing business is $80,000,000 and the value of her manufactures $100,000,000.

5. DIVERSITY OF INDUSTRY AND AGRICULTURE.

As to diversity of industry and agriculture in the district which Richmond could serve better than any other location it can not perhaps be better illustrated than by giving the annual value of products of factories, farms, forests, and mines, which are the principal divisions of labor.

The business of the Southern States as represented by industry in these divisions is as follows:

Factories	$1,391,000,000
Farms	1,197,000,000
Forests	266,000,000
Mines	106,000,000
Total values of all products as above	2,960,000,000

Dr. S. C. Mitchell, in his admirable paper read to you at the hearing given Richmond, states that:

"The diversity of interests in this region are as striking as its natural and economic unity."

Perhaps in no other division of the United States will you find so great a variety of interests.

The developing character of the district is of equal importance. Your committee shares with us the knowledge that it is within little more than two decades that this region began its real recovery from utter prostration and that now its rate of progress exceeds that of any other portion of the country.

Mr. O. P. Austin, whom we have previously quoted, estimates the value of the merchandise handled in the district at $5,000,000,000, or more than the entire ingoing and outgoing foreign commerce of the United States.

Richmond is to day, and probably always will be, the chief tobacco center of the United States.

Four governments, or their chief tobacco interests, maintain the headquarters of their buyers or handle their business through Richmond.

Forty per cent of the tobacco crop raised in Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina in 1913 came directly to Richmond for rehandling and manufacturing, and Richmond banks supplied the tobacco trade of Richmond in exchange to the various tobacco markets, and paid out in Richmond in 1913 the enormous sum of $53,000,000, or 88 per cent of the total value of the crop in North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia.

A considerable portion of this sum, however, was sent to Kentucky and West Virginia.

Of the total collections of internal revenue by the Government from tobacco in its various forms for the year 1912, 20 per cent was collected from territory within a radius of eight hours from Richmond.

As to diversity of crops of the district in their effect upon the demands for credit and currency, Richmond, being situated at the northern limit of the district, occupies this incontestable advantage as a Federal reserve bank location—the climatic differences of the Southern States, in their effect upon crop development, come in orderly rotation up to Virginia. The demands upon the Federal reserve bank of Richmond would be uniform and continuous.

The peak of the load would doubtless be in the fall; but that would be the case everywhere else, and it is the purpose of the new law to provide for it.

Further illustrating the diversity of crop and industrial conditions in this district, the railroads serving it are at present among the most prosperous in the country. We do not know how to account for it on any other basis than the diversity of interests and the consequent absence of any general depression.

Added to her advantages for assembling and manufacturing the products of industry, her facilities for distribution heretofore described are positively unsurpassed by any other southern city.

We will give you a very recent concrete instance: One of the very large corporations of this country, with headquarters at St. Louis, has just selected Richmond as one of two depots on the Atlantic seaboard most advantageously located for the storage and distribution of its products, New York being the other point.

Richmond is a reserve center of products.

6. CAPITAL RESOURCES OF THE DISTRICT.

As to the confines and capital resources of the district of which Richmond is the logical and most advantageous location for a Federal reserve bank:

The rules laid down by the organization committee for their guidance are so just and wise that all men must acquiesce in and approve them.

Under the language of the law and the spirit and purpose of the act, we believe that the natural territory of a district—considering geographical convenience, natural boundaries, ease and quickness of communication and transportation; as great diversity of industry and agriculture as may be found anywhere; natural trend of business and exchanges; the banking customs and trade relations of a majority portion of the territory; the desires of a majority portion of the people—is embraced in the zone mapped out to be served by a Federal bank located in Richmond, namely, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, southern part of West Virginia, part of eastern Tennessee, part of eastern Kentucky.

These States have adequate national-bank resources to contribute the necessary capital and reserves for a regional bank.

They also have a strong system of State banks, which would add largely to resources should these banks elect to enter the system, which, possibly, may not be counted upon in time for organization of the Federal banks.

National banking capital in the proposed district, according to the comptroller's figures, October 21, 1913:

States.	Capital and surplus.	Capital subscribed to Federal reserve bank.
Virginia	$29,300,000	$1,758,000
North Carolina	11,300,000	678,000
South Carolina	8,500,000	510,000
Georgia	22,900,000	1,374,000
Florida	10,600,000	636,000
West Virginia, one-half	8,300,000	498,000
East Tennessee	8,300,000	498,000
East Kentucky	1,300,000	78,000
Total	100,500,000	6,030,000

The total capital and surplus of the State banks in the States named, including one-half of West Virginia, omitting for the moment those portions of Kentucky and Tennessee included in the zone, is $68,000,000.

Now as to the net deposits requiring reserves:

	Net deposits.
Virginia	$100,000,000
North Carolina	36,000,000
South Carolina	23,000,000
Georgia	50,000,000
Florida	33,000,000
West Virginia—say one-half	29,000,000
Total net deposits	271,000,000

not taking into account the portions of Tennessee and Kentucky, included in the district, for lack of comptroller's figures.

Classifying these as country banks, the amount of reserve required to be kept in the Federal reserve bank, under full operation of the act, would be—

Say 5 per cent, or	$13,000,000
Government deposits divided in proportion to the capital involved would probably be, say, 6 per cent, or	9,000,000
State banks might swell the amount, say	2,000,000
Full-paid capital	6,000,000
Total probable resources	30,000,000

Omitting from consideration the note-issuing powers of the bank, the resources would serve as a basis for the expansion of credit in the usual way to possibly $75,000,000.

It is considered by many that the credit business of these banks will far overshadow the note-issue business, and we share that view.

Now, the banking power of these banks is not to be measured solely by capital resources but by their ability to acquire gold and to build up deposits and loans in the usual way upon their reserves as a base, and also by their note-issue power upon this base.

It is estimated that the floating supply of gold or its representative in this country not in banks is approximately $800,000,000, doing duty as currency or hoarded.

It is certainly not performing its greatest economic function as currency.

In Federal reserve banks it would serve as the basis for two and one-half times its volume in a safe and sound currency, and it is clear that here is a large source of gold supply.

It is probable that with stable banking conditions, as one beneficial result of the act, gold will to a large extent cease to be hoarded and gradually come from hiding

The total amount of borrowings and rediscounts of all the Southern States, excluding Texas, was, on October 21, 1913, about $40,000,000, and of the States named $25,000,000.

It is clear that the resources of a Federal reserve bank in the district mapped out would be entirely adequate to serve the district.

Furthermore, it is to be borne in mind that the reserve figured upon is the minimum reserve, and if the banks make any use whatever of the Federal banks they will be compelled to keep more of their reserve with them.

The area covered would be about 250,000 square miles and the population about 10,000,000.

7. WISHES AND VIEWS OF THE BANKS AND PEOPLE IN THE DISTRICT AND THEIR PRESENT BANKING CONNECTIONS.

In Virginia out of a total of 437 banks 404 have voted for Richmond as first choice.

In North Carolina out of a total of 486 banks 373 have voted for Richmond as first choice and 69 as second choice.

In South Carolina out of a total of 405 banks 82 have voted for Richmond as first choice and 122 as second choice, Columbia being, of course, first choice. Only 18 of the remaining banks in South Carolina voted, and these were scattered.

The capital and deposits of the South Carolina banks voting first for Richmond were greater than those voting first for their own city—Columbia.

So that, out of a total of 1,328 banks in three States, of the number voting, 863 gave Richmond as first choice and 191 gave Richmond as second choice.

Eliminating Charlotte and Columbia, 1,052 banks out of a total of 1,328 in the three States regard Richmond as the proper location of their Federal reserve bank.

In West Virginia, in the southern half of the State, 49 banks have selected Richmond as first choice and 26 as second.

Richmond has been designated as the preferred location by firms and individuals outside of Richmond as follows:

Virginia	1,063
North Carolina	870
South Carolina	141
West Virginia	154

We are therefore fully justified in the statement that there is a very strong feeling in Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina that they must be included together in any zone which may be formed, and that whatever territory may be incorporated in their zone a Federal reserve bank located in Richmond would serve their interests better than if located in any other city.

The interests of these three States are too closely interwoven to be separated.

If any further corroboration can possibly be desired by the committee, we respectfully refer to the sentiments expressed by North Carolina, South Carolina, and also by West Virginia bankers at the hearing given Richmond in Washington on January 15, and to the exhibit of resolutions, petitions, letters, and telegrams accompanying this brief.

We respectfully submit that compliance with the letter and intent of the law, which declares that the Federal reserve districts shall be determined with due regard to the convenience and customary course of business, would demand that these three States shall be kept together in one district, so that their mutual trade and financial relations may not be disrupted or disturbed

The district we have outlined is the most perfect geographical division of the country that can be carved out. Nature has placed her boundaries, sharply defining it. We believe it is an equally perfect economic unit. It is a political division equally sharply defined.

The inhabitants are more homogeneous than in any other division or part of the United States. All of these considerations have a practical bearing.

Our crops and the credits based upon them are distinctive, and the management of the regional bank should bear the closest relation to, and have the closest familiarity with, the needs and customs of the district. For this reason, as well as for all the foregoing reasons, whatever territory may be added to this zone, the headquarters of any bank organized to serve the zone, or any large part of it, should not be located north of Richmond.

This position and all of these conclusions are separately and independently confirmed by the learned and experienced authorities, Dr. S. C. Mitchell and O. P. Austin, former Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Commerce, whose papers have been filed with you.

Finally, why Richmond can better serve the zone mapped out than any city in it, or any city in territory north of Richmond which might be added to the zone, and why Richmond may therefore be entitled to the location of a Federal reserve bank.

In the entire zone mapped out Virginia is the dominating State financially, and Richmond clearly the dominating city. Since colonial times Virginia has been the dominating State in the South.

Richmond has played a part far ahead of any other city in the zone in its development, from a banking point of view, an industrial point of view, and a railroad point of view.

Long ago Richmond found that in this zone she had a preferential freight-rate territory, and that in this territory the cities north of her could not compete on equal terms with Richmond. This preferential territory extends through the zone described to southern Georgia and Alabama and the eastern State line of Mississippi.

It does not embrace the State of Florida because of water competition. The territory is more graphically portrayed on the map which accompanies.

The trade relations of Richmond in this territory, out of which spring banking relations and settlements, must continue to grow, and more and more exclude cities north of Richmond.

The average first-class rate in the territory gives Richmond an advantage over, we will say, Baltimore, by way of illustration, that being the next large city of commercial importance north of Richmond, gives Richmond an advantage of 11.2 cents per hundred pounds, or approximately 13 per cent.

This relative proportion in favor of Richmond applies to all class and commodity rates, and in some instances it is greater in favor of Richmond.

For full details we refer to the statement of Mr. W. T. Reed, president of the Richmond Chamber of Commerce, which statement accompanies.

Commercial supremacy in this territory must go hand in hand with banking supremacy, particularly under a natural and free system of banking.

Granting the selection of this territory, or any large part of it, as a zone, the advantage of Richmond in point of time and distance in dealing with the members of the zone is so great as to exclude any city north of her from consideration; and the equal advantage of Richmond as a clearing point between zones, for the same reasons, would likewise exclude any northern city.

It is firmly to be borne in mind, as we understand, that the purpose of the Federal reserve act is to afford additional banking facilities to the people, and that Federal reserve banks shall be so placed as to best serve the people with reference to the operation of the system as a whole. Should Federal banks be placed in the three great cities of the East which we have named, that fact in itself, we believe, would justly exclude from consideration the location of headquarters of another bank in any city north of Richmond.

They are not intended to be local, and for that reason branches are provided, and due consideration is not generally given to the power and facilities of these branches.

It goes without saying that this zone mapped out will be provided with these additional facilities, superior to any which they have heretofore enjoyed, by the location of a bank in Richmond, that branch banks will answer local needs, and that the zone will be more independent of the financial considerations which have bound it to large money centers in the East; and this, too, was intended and can best be brought about by the location of a bank within the region described as a natural division of country.

Is there any man who doubts that if State lines were obliterated and the country apportioned in these geographical divisions Richmond would by acclaim be chosen the capital of this division?

Although resting our claims upon the financial strength and the economics of the situation, we have also those considerations in our favor which are most powerful in molding the character and ideals of a nation.

Richmond has a place in the affections of the South which no other city possesses.

She has a place in the annals of the Nation and the world which is imperishable.

The debt of the Nation to Virginia is inextinguishable.

It is difficult to see how this Republic could have been formed but for Virginia.

Richmond has that dignity of standing, that atmosphere of sentiment and history, that position in science and learning, which render her worthy of any honor or distinction that can be bestowed upon her, and the intelligent judgment of the whole country, having a knowledge of these considerations, would approve the location of a Federal reserve bank in Richmond.

The names of Virginians will be associated for all time in the financial history of this country with the Federal reserve act.

All of these considerations preeminently distinguish Richmond as the location of a Federal reserve bank.

THE SOUTH ATLANTIC COASTAL PLAIN—A DISTINCT GEOGRAPHICAL AND CLIMATIC UNIT—ITS PRODUCTS, PECULIAR TO ITS OWN SOIL AND CLIMATE, SHOULD BE FINANCED BY MEN ACQUAINTED WITH LOCAL CONDITIONS.

[By O. P. Austin, 15 years Chief of the United States Bureau of Statistics; secretary of the National Geographic Society.]

Nature has set aside the south Atlantic frontage of this continent as a distinct and peculiar section and has given to it a class of products which are peculiar to itself, and with the financing of which its own people are more closely acquainted than those of any other section are or can become. The Atlantic coastal plain, which in recent geological ages emerged from beneath the ocean, stretches from New York southward to the Gulf of Mexico and is shut off from the West by great mountain ranges.

PECULIARITIES OF PRODUCING POWER.

At the northern end it is a narrow and sandy plain, but gradually widening toward the South. At about the point at which the Potomac crosses it it suddenly broadens to a width of approximately 200 miles, and at that point enter two new and important factors in its producing power—a fertile soil and a genial climate.

EXPERT TESTIMONY AS TO SOILS.

Prof. Jay A. Bonsteel, a distinguished soil expert of the Department of Agriculture, in a general description of the soils of the United States, which appeared in the 1911 edition of the official publications of the Department of Agriculture, The Agricultural Yearbook, and in a similar discussion of the soils contributing to the trucking system of the South Atlantic coast, presented in the 1912 issue of that official publication, says:

"The Norfolk fine sandy loam extends from eastern Virginia southward along the Atlantic coast to Florida and thence westward. Among all the truck soils in use or available along the middle Atlantic coast, the Norfolk fine sandy loam easily occupies the premier place both with regard to its total extent and its wide range of possible products. It has been formed as a sedimentary deposit, laid down under the waters of a more extended marine occupation, and later elevated to become a portion of the present land area.

AN IDEAL SOIL FOR MARKET GARDENING.

"Physically it is almost ideally constituted for the intensive growing of crops. It is of prime importance for the production of vegetables and small fruit. In the eastern counties of Virginia and North Carolina it is also used for the production of corn, winter oats, peanuts, and bright cigarette tobacco, and from the southern boundary of Virginia to Texas it is highly prized as a cotton soil. Where local transportation facilities are adequate it is intensively farmed for the production of vegetables and small fruits for shipment to northern markets.

PRESENT PRODUCTS MAY BE MANY TIMES MULTIPLIED.

"Soil surveys throughout this region have encountered a total area of 4,346,000 acres of this soil, and it is possible that 20,000,000 acres will be found to exist. Not one-tenth of 1 per cent of this total area is now occupied for truck farming, and it is probable that not 25 per cent is now used for any agricultural purposes other than grazing."

EXPERT TESTIMONY AS TO CLIMATE.

These extracts from official descriptions of the peculiar soil factor in the producing power of this section should be considered in conjunction with that other important factor, climatic conditions.

A GREAT OUT-OF-DOORS GREENHOUSE.

That the conditions of climate are as peculiar as those of soil and equally effective in developing a production different from that of other parts of the country is also indicated by Prof. Bonsteel in his 1912 discussion, in which he describes this coastal frontage as "a great out-of-doors greenhouse," and, in another place, "the great winter garden which supplies the cities of the Northeastern States with fresh vegetables demanded for consumption during the later months of winter and those of early spring."

THE GULF STREAM A FACTOR IN PRODUCING POWER.

This peculiar condition of climate, and thus of producing power, he attributes in part to the presence of the Gulf Stream, which, as is well known, flows close to the Atlantic coast as far north as Cape Hatteras, but leaves the coast at that point, moving in a northeastwardly direction across the Atlantic.

A TROPICAL AND SUBTROPICAL CLIMATE.

The peculiarities of climate (and, therefore, of the producing power) of this section are also pointed out in the International Encyclopedia, edited by that great scholar and educator, the late Daniel Coit Gilman, for 25 years the president of Johns Hopkins University, which says: "The United States has been divided into eight (climatic) sections; two of these are tropical, Florida and Texas; two are subtropical, including the coast States from Texas to Virginia and the California region; the other four sections are temperate or boreal."

ITS PRODUCTS REQUIRE FINANCING FROM WITHIN THIS AREA.

These statements from two distinguished authorities regarding the peculiar characteristics of the South Atlantic frontage in the great factors of production, soil and climate, are presented with the purpose of sustaining the statement already made by us, that the chief products of this section, which must prove the basis of its requirements for credit and currency, are peculiar to this section, and would be much better understood in their relation to credit and to currency requirements by the officers of a bank located within that section than would be possible elsewhere.

AN AREA OF PECULIAR AND VARIED PRODUCTION.

What are the products of this section which nature has thus set aside with a peculiar soil and climate, and, therefore, a class of products to itself? Beginning at the South, we may name sea-island cotton, approximately $7,000,000; phosphates, about $10,000,000; peanuts, $15,000,000; turpentine and rosin, $30,000,000; cottonseed oil and cake, approximately $45,000,000; fruits, $15,000,000; tobacco, $32,000,000; vegetables, exclusive of potatoes, $36,000,000; sweet potatoes, $15,000,000; products of the mines, $100,000,000; animals, sold or slaughtered on farms, $92,000,000; all cereals, $167,000,000; cotton, $255,000,000; all farm crops, $690,000,000; all manufactures, $987,000,000; these being in nearly all cases the figures of the census of 1909.

THE WORLD'S CHIEF PRODUCER OF IMPORTANT ARTICLES OF COMMERCE.

It will be seen that a large proportion of the articles produced in these six States are intensely local, the product of the peculiar soil and subtropical climate referred to by the distinguished scholars already quoted. The United States is now one of the principal sponge producing and exporting countries of the world, and practically all of this produce is peculiar to the coast of Florida. We are the world's largest producers of turpentine and rosin, and practically all of our output is produced in Florida and Georgia. Our sea-island cotton is famed the world over, and practically all of it is produced along the extreme South Atlantic coast. Of the $23,000,000 worth of citrus fruits produced in the United States nearly one-third is grown in Florida. The United States is the world's largest producer of rock phosphates, and most of this is now mined in the State of Florida. The value of peanuts produced in the United States increased from $7,250,000 in 1899 to $18,250,000 in 1909, and 78 per cent of these were produced in Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, and Florida. Of the approximately $120,000,000 worth of cottonseed oil and meal produced in the United States in 1909, more than one-third was the product of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia. Of the 1,000,000,000 pounds of tobacco grown in the United States in 1909, practically one-third was the product of the six States—Virginia, West Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida.

VALUE OF ITS DISTINCTLY LOCAL PRODUCTS $500,000,000 PER ANNUM.

The value of these distinctively tropical or subtropical products of this section is, stated in round terms, $450,000,000 per annum; sea-island cotton, $7,000,000; citrus fruits, $6,000,000; sugar, $3,000,000; dry peas, $3,000,000; peanuts, $15,000,000; sweet potatoes, $15,000,000; turpentine and rosin, $30,000,000; vegetables $36,000,000; fruits $15,000,000; small fruits, $4,000,000; tobacco, $32,000,000; cottonseed oil and meal, $45,000,000; cotton, $255,000,000; while if we add to these the phosphates and sponges of Florida and other land and water products peculiar to that section, we get a grand total of approximately $500,000,000 worth of products distinctly tropical or subtropical in character.

ITS PRODUCTS SHOULD BE FINANCED FROM WITHIN ITS OWN AREA.

The fact that the grand total of the production of this section is made up of a large number of articles not closely related to each other, but having for each a distinctive characteristic as to production and use, intensifies the importance of selecting some convenient point well within that section as the locus of the reserve bank for the district. While the economic methods of the South as a whole have been criticized upon the ground that it does not sufficiently diversify its products, such charge can not be sustained with reference to the area which we are bringing to your attention. One of the speakers who appeared before your honorable body, a gentleman of high standing in the financial circles of the Capital City of the Nation, remarked that one of the objects of this law is to decentralize reserves as they now exist and distribute them among several reservoirs, each reservoir to be located with regard to the due convenience of a district wherein a great number of diversified industries are carried on, to build up every branch of industry and commerce; a suggestion which, we submit, applies with great force to the South Atlantic section as one having great diversity of production, and to Richmond as the natural center of the finance and commerce growing out of such production.

RICHMOND AN IDEAL FINANCIAL CENTER OF THE DISTRICT.

That this great mass of distinctively southern products can be more intelligently understood and financed from a distinctively southern city can not be doubted. Not only would Richmond be conveniently located for the prompt transmission of mails and expressage to the section in which this great mass of products originates, but the acquaintance of her people with the peculiar products in question—the phosphates, the naval stores, the peanut crop, the tropical fruits, the tobacco, the cottonseed oil and meal, and the sea island and upland cotton, their seasons of growth and preparation for market—all these would be better understood and the interests of their producers better served from Richmond than Washington, which has no active business relation with the producing manufacturing, or commercial interests, or from Baltimore, which is still farther removed from the area of the chief production of these peculiar and distinctively "local" products.

VOLUME OF LOCAL BUSINESS REQUIRES A RESERVE BANK.

The section lying south of the Potomac and east of the Appalachians is amply sufficient in area, population, and the value of its products for the service of a regional bank. The population of the six States which we propose as that section—Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida—is in round numbers 11,000,000 by the census of 1910; the value of its farm property $2,500,000,000; its capital invested in manufactures, over $1,000,000,000; the products of its manufactures, nearly $1,000,000,000 in 1909, and now much more than $1,000,000,000; the value of its farm crops, by the census of 1909, $690,000,000; the products of its mines, $100,000,000; the length of its railways, 29,000 miles; and the navigable mileage of its rivers, over 5,000 miles, or one-fifth of the total of the United States. The officers of the War Department in charge of the 105 river and harbor works on its water frontage from the upper Potomac to the western coast of Florida, report the value of the water-borne freight traffic at those places in 1912 at the enormous sum of $1,680,000,000, of which about one-half is at Hampton Roads.

VALUE OF MERCHANDISE HANDLED, $5,000,000,000 PER ANNUM.

The census of 1910 placed the value of the manufactures of this area at $987,000,000; the farm crops at $688,000,000; the products of the mines, $100,000,000; the farm animals slaughtered or sold, $92,000,000; and, adding a reasonable estimate for the products of the forests and fisheries, the total production of the area in that year may be set down at nearly $2,000,000,000, indicating that the annual value of its various products at the present time is more than $2,500,000,000. Most of this $2,500,000,000 worth of annual products is moved from the place of production to other parts of the country, or to other sections of the world, and in their stead there is purchased about an equal value of other merchandise, suggesting that the value of the merchandise handled in this district in a single year is approximately $5,000,000,000, or more than the entire foreign commerce of the United States.

BUSINESS OF THIS AREA IS RAPIDLY INCREASING.

That this enormous total of $5,000,000,000 worth of merchandise annually handled in this section is likely to grow very rapidly is apparent from the figures of actual growth during recent periods. The total value of the manufactures produced in these six States increased 123 per cent from 1899 to 1909, while the gain in all other parts of the country was but 80 per cent. The value of all farm crops in these States increased 120 per cent for the period from 1899 to 1909, while that in other parts of the country increased but 83 per cent. The coal production of this area increased 250 per cent in the 10-year period, while that of the country as a whole only doubled. The capital invested in manufacturing in these States increased 171 per cent from 1899 to 1909, while the gain in the whole manufacturing capital of the country was but 105 per cent. The wages and salaries paid in manufacturing increased 123 per cent, while that in other parts of the country increased but 80 per cent. The railroad mileage increased 70 per cent from 1890 to 1911, and in the otner portions of the country increased but 47 per cent. The internal revenue paid increased from $10,500,000 in 1903 to $21,000,000 in 1912, a gain of 100 per cent, while the gain in the other parts of the country was but 40 per cent in the same period. The estimated true value of all property, as shown by the United States census, increased from $4,000,000,000 in 1900 to over $5,000,000,000 in 1904, an increase of 26 per cent, while the increase in other parts of the country was but 21 per cent. The total indebtedness less sinking fund of these six States was, according to the United States census, $94,000,000 in 1890 and $100,000,000 in 1902, an increase of less than 7 per cent, while the indebtedness of other States of the Union showed an increase of 64 per cent in the same period. The average per capita indebtedness of these six States fell from $12.82 for each individual in 1890 to $11.02 in 1902, while that of the country as a whole increased from $18.16 per capita in 1890 to $23.73 in 1902. The expenditures on public roads in these six States now aggregate about $15,000,000 per annum, a fact which in itself promises great development of its agricultural power.

ALL GREAT INDUSTRIES REPRESENTED IN THIS REGION.

The value of the three great products of this section—agriculture, manufactures, and mining—are quite evenly distributed in proportion to the products of the entire United States. The farm crops of the section in question formed in 1909 about 12 per cent of those of the entire United States, the manufactures about 5 per cent, and the minerals approximately 5 per cent of those of the entire United States.

FOREIGN COMMERCE OF THIS AREA RAPIDLY GROWING.

The value of the foreign commerce of the frontage from the mouth of the Potomac to the western coast of Florida is now approximately $150,000,000, and shows a rapid growth when compared with other sections of the country. At Norfolk and Newport News, especially, lying as they do at that great natural harbor of the United States—Hampton Roads—the exports of the fiscal year 1913 show a remarkable growth, having practically doubled in the past two years.

A GATEWAY FOR THE PRODUCTS OF THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

The possibilities of this great harbor in becoming the natural gateway for the Mississippi Valley, with its enormous production for foreign markets and consumption of foreign merchandise, are worthy of serious attention in considering the future possibilities and probabilities of the commerce and commercial requirements of this section. With two great railway lines now transporting to this port the merchandise of the upper Mississippi Valley, over remarkably easy grades and free from the interruption of a northern winter climate, it may be expected that the remarkable growth of recent years will be continued.

A SHIP CANAL POSSIBILITY.

Still another possibility of an enormous increase in the foreign commerce of Hampton Roads is found in the suggestion of a ship canal to connect the Great Lakes with the Atlantic Ocean. Our experience at Panama has demonstrated the ability of our country and its engineers in opening a passageway for ocean vessels through a country where the natural obstacles are much greater than those which lie between the Atlantic and the Great Lakes, and if the Government of the United States should see fit to utilize for this great enterprise the men and machinery which have accomplished the work at Panama, the route from Hampton Roads, along the lines suggested by George Washington to the Ohio River and thence to the Great Lakes, would be worthy of serious consideration, and if adopted make this the gateway for the outflow of the products of that greatest producing section of the world—the Mississippi Valley—and the route by which it would in turn receive its requirements from foreign countries.

PANAMA CANAL WILL INCREASE TRADE AND CURRENCY REQUIREMENTS.

The Panama Canal will, when opened to commerce, immediately stimulate the coastal trade of this section. At present a narrow strip of country along the Atlantic frontage sends its merchandise for the Pacific coast by water by way of the trans-Isthmian railways, which demand for their service one-third of the entire coast to coast charges, the annual volume of that trans-Isthmian traffic between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts being now more than $100,000,000 per annum. With the possibility of passing the products of the eastern and western coasts across the Isthmus without the cost of rail movement, the volume of this traffic between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts will greatly increase. In addition to this, the export of our manufactures and agricultural products to the western coasts of South America, and, in fact, to all the countries fronting on the Pacific, may be expected to rapidly increase with the opening of the canal and thus greatly enlarge the foreign commerce of this South Atlantic country and the requirements of currency for that purpose.

SUMMARIZATION.

Now, to sum up the great general facts as to the production, commerce, and commercial possibilities of the area in question.

The section of country lying south of the Potomac and east of the Appalachians is set aside by nature as a distinctive region by reason of its peculiar soil and climate and geographic surroundings, and has therefore products peculiar to itself.

Its total products, which aggregated nearly $2,000,000,000 in value in 1910 and more than that at the present time, are distributed with remarkable uniformity among the three great industries—agriculture, mining, and manufactures—agricultural and mineral products forming about one half and manufactures the other half of this grand total.

The agricultural products represent an unusually large variety of articles which have their peculiar seasons of maturity, and thus cooperating with the manufacturing and mining industries in maintaining within the district a comparative uniformity and steadiness of demand for currency.

Approximately one-third of these three great articles of commerce—manufactures, farm crops, and minerals—are produced in the two Northern States of the group, Virginia and West Virginia, and approximately two-thirds in the four States lying to the South, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida; but as most of these products of the Southern States move toward the North, Richmond, which lies within 60 miles of the southern line of Virginia and on the natural line of the northward trend of commerce and communication, becomes the natural center for the trade and finance of both sections of this natural region.

The productions of this area may be expected to increase with great rapidity. Both manufacturing and agriculture showed in the period of 1900–1910 a much larger percentage of growth than that of all other parts of the country, and with the greatly increased use of water power through the cooperation of electricity the contribution of the rivers of this section to its manufacturing power will rapidly increase its industrial and commercial activities.

The foreign commerce of this section may be expected to rapidly increase. The value of the merchandise exported from the ports from the mouth of the Potomac to the western line of Florida is now approximately $140,000,000 per annum, and those two cities at the great natural harbor—Hampton Roads—have actually doubled their exports in the last two years, suggesting that the possibilities of this section as the gateway for the surplus products of the Mississippi Valley should be given careful consideration in connection with the financing of its prospective business.

The value of the merchandise passing over the waters of the navigable rivers and harbors from the Potomac to the western boundary of Florida was $1,750,000,000 in 1912, the total value of its own products in 1912 fully $2,500,000,000, and the value of the commerce handled by it approximately $5,000,000,000 per annum, and may be expected to increase with great rapidity in view of the rapid growth which has characterized recent years.

Richmond is the natural railway center for the movement of this commerce, and its mail and express requirements with reference thereto, having three trunk lines from the South, two from the West, and two from the North, and a close communication with Norfolk with its western and southern lines.

MARYLAND AS A POSSIBLE FACTOR IN THE RESERVE ZONE.

While a portion of the State of Maryland lies geographically and geologically within the South Atlantic coastal plain, the distinct area proposed as the basis of a banking district, that State has not been included in the proposed Federal reserve region because of the fact that its products are, as a whole, not of the distinctively tropical or subtropical type which distinguishes those of the section farther south, where the presence of the Gulf Stream affects climatic conditions, and also because of the equally important fact that the trade currents carry most of the commerce and therefore the finances of that State toward the great commercial and financial centers of the North. On the other hand, it has been thought proper to include West Virginia in the proposed regional bank area, even though it lies outside the coastal plain region, because of the fact that the commerce and finances of a large part of the State, especially the southern half, are distinctly associated with those of the Atlantic coastal plain and with the State of Virginia and the city of Richmond, a fact which is clearly shown in the discussion of present banking relations of Richmond with surrounding territory.

It is proper to add, however, that a careful comparison of the figures of industry, production, and commerce of the two States—Maryland and West Virginia—when considered article by article and item by item, show that a substitution of Maryland for West Virginia in the statement of products, manufactures, and business conducted would not materially change the total of the area as a whole or seriously affect the percentage of growth or other evidence of prosperity of that area. The population of West Virginia in 1910 was 1,221,000, and that of Maryland was 1,295,000. The combined value of the products of farm, factory, and mine were, in West Virginia, $274,000,000, and in Maryland $366,000,000; and the value of all farm property in West Virginia $314,000,000, and in Maryland $286,000,000.

STATEMENT SHOWING FREIGHT RATES FROM RICHMOND TO SOUTHERN WEST VIRGINIA, EASTERN KENTUCKY, EASTERN TENNESSEE, NORTH AND SOUTH CAROLINA, AND GEORGIA; ALSO TONNAGE FROM VIRGINIA CITIES INTO NORTH AND SOUTH CAROLINA AND GEORGIA.

[By Richmond Chamber of Commerce, William T. Reed, President.]

The railroads serving the above-mentioned territory years ago recognized Richmond as the proper distributing point, and the above as the natural territory to Richmond, owing to the fact that they were enabled to give quick service, and from one to four days quicker delivery than Baltimore or any city north of us. In view of this fact the rates into this territory were fixed at an average, approximately, of 13 per cent lower than Baltimore. The average first-class rate in the territory designated by the railroads as the natural territory to Richmond is 75.2 cents per hundred pounds, while the average first-class rate to the same territory from Baltimore is 86.4 cents per hundred pounds, giving Richmond an advantage on the first-class rate of 11.2 cents per hundred pounds, or approximately 13 per cent. This relative proportion in favor of Richmond applies to all class and commodity rates, and in some instances it is greater in favor of Richmond.

Attached herewith, on page 41, is a map clearly defining the territory recognized by the transportation companies as Richmond's territory, and in which the above-mentioned freight rates favorable to Richmond apply. Attached also, on page 40, are the actual rates in groups of cities in this respective territory, giving the respective rates to these cities from Richmond and Baltimore. These cities are chosen with respect to their prominence and also with respect to their proximity to the borders of the territory as designated by the map on page 41. Some of the rates in the interior of this territory will even show greater advantage to Richmond.

The chamber begs to call attention further to the tonnage originating at and forwarded to this southern territory—North and South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida—from the Virginia cities, Richmond, Norfolk, Portsmouth, Suffolk, Petersburg, Lynchburg, Roanoke, Danville, and South Boston. The total tonnage from these cities for the year 1913 reaches the enormous amount of 2,228,908 tons freight, and of this amount the tonnage from Richmond into this territory was 629,495 tons.

Owing to the limited time, and also to the fact that the tonnage into eastern Tennessee, eastern Kentucky, and southern West Virginia had not been separated by the railroads from the tonnage to this territory and points beyond our territory, we are unable to give the actual tonnage to this portion of our territory.

We have been unable to get the tonnage from Baltimore into Richmond's territory—North and South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida—but from such information as we have received we feel assured that any statement Baltimore makes that her tonnage exceeds or even approaches the amount of tonnage of Richmond in the territory mentioned is a pretense, and, inasmuch as Baltimore made this claim before the honorable committee at Washington, it is incumbent upon the Baltimore people to state their exact tonnage, as we have done, and which we are prepared to verify.

OPINION OF EXPERTS.

NEW YORK CITY, April 15, 1914.

OLIVER J. SANDS,
President American National Bank, Richmond, Va.:

Richmond, in my opinion, presented a strong and convincing case in favor of location for a reserve bank under the new banking law. She showed adequate capital and essential tributary territory for a reserve district, rapid growth in resources in recent years, indicating further growth in the future; a location much more convenient to nearly all southern points than any city north of the Potomac; facilities for communication by water and railway within a few hours, and without risk of interruption by accident; a large volume of loans to southern banks; general support by banks of tributary territory; and conformity with requirements of the law that the districts should be "apportioned with due regard to the convenient and customary course of business." It was my belief, as stated to the organization committee, that the entire territory northeast of the Potomac should constitute a district, with a strong bank at New York as the center; but Richmond had convincing claims under any reasonable apportionment as one of the reserve banks of the South.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 15, 1914.

Mr. OLIVER J. SANDS,
Chairman Committee on Regional Reserve Banks,
Washington, D. C.:

My advocacy of Richmond as a location for a regional reserve bank was the result of a careful study of economic conditions of the area adjacent thereto, including population, climatic conditions, soil, productions, manufactures, commerce, wealth, and currency requirements. This study was made with a perfectly-open mind and my conclusions reached after the consideration of the claims of all the cities asking for that honor. I found Richmond the natural geographical, commercial, and financial center of the great Atlantic coastal plain, a region peculiar to itself in soil, climate, production, and business conditions and requirements, and thus became convinced that that city was by far the best suited for a regional bank from which the currency and business requirements of the area in question could be served. While this conclusion was based upon a consideration of an area composed of Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, and Georgia, the fact that Maryland and the District of Columbia substituted for Florida and Georgia in the final determination of the area in no degree reduced, but rather increased, the economic, commercial, and financial claims of Richmond for the reserve bank of that region as the geographical center of the district in its final form. Richmond has especial advantages, and the location of the reserve bank at that point will save a day's time in the mail collections of a large proportion of the banks when compared with the facilities which any other city of the area could offer. I consider the final determination of the area and the selection of Richmond for the reserve bank as a logical and wise conclusion, and believe it will be so recognized when subjected to the test of business operations under the new law.

O. P. AUSTIN.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the following article, including a letter from Maj. Dooley, of Richmond, Va, to Comptroller Williams, published in the Richmond Times-Dispatch on the 3d instant, be read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HISTORY AND TRADITION FAVORED RICHMOND BANK—MAJ. DOOLEY'S LETTER TO COMPTROLLER WILLIAMS DWELT ON STRONG BOND BETWEEN SOUTH AND ONE-TIME CAPITAL OF THE CONFEDERACY.

More than two months ago when the regional bank campaign in Richmond, at its high-water mark in enthusiasm, had attracted to its standard supporters from every phase of the city's commercial and professional life, Maj. James H. Dooley addressed to Comptroller John Skelton Williams a pro-Richmond letter remarkable for the strength of its appeal

The letter touched only lightly upon the usual arguments based on banking capital, transportation facilities, and trend of trade, but dwelt with emphasis upon the peculiar attachment that for a century and more has obtained between Richmond, the one-time capital of the Confederacy, and the country to the south that looked to her for guidance.

MAJ. DOOLEY'S LETTER.

RICHMOND, VA., January 21, 1914.

Mr. JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS,
Comptroller, and Member of the Organization Committee,
United States Regional Banks.

MY DEAR SIR: Knowing the multitudinous duties which are crowding upon you since your appointment to your present highly honorable and most important position and how you must be pressed for time in giving proper consideration to the great affairs upon which it is necessary for you to pass judgment, I wish to recall to your mind, as succinctly as I am able, a few of the reasons which, if I were occupying the position which you so ably fill, might weigh with me in considering the claims of Richmond to be the seat of a regional bank.

As I read the law, the committee is required, amongst other things, to take into consideration the geographical position of the candidate cities and, of course, their relations in business and otherwise to the surrounding country. I assume that this means, in a general way, that each great division of the United States should have a regional bank.

Originally there were two great divisions of the United States—the North and the South. Virginia was the brains and the leader of the South. It is scarcely too much to say she furnished the brains which conducted the War of the Revolution and brought into existence the United States of America. In the three-quarters of a century which elapsed between the Revolution and the unfortunate War between the States Virginia was ever the life and soul of the southern division of the United States. Her sons and pioneers developed the Territories of the cis-Mississippi, carried into them her arts, her civilization, her ideas, and created of them, one by one, new communities which, nourished as her children, eventually evolved into independent sovereign States of the Union.

But always they looked to her as the sacred and revered mother. Such was the intensity of this feeling when the unfortunate War between the States, despite the pleadings and warnings of the old mother, broke out they unanimously turned to Virginia as the leader and to Richmond as their capital city. When the Confederacy died and all was ruin and desolation throughout the limits of these once fair and prosperous lands, it was Virginia and her capital city, Richmond, the capital city of the Confederacy, that stood forth a beacon light and with calm resolution and undaunted courage pointed the way to safety and finally led her children back into the folds of that Union from which they had been expelled.

It is unnecessary for me to urge upon your attention that Richmond is still to all intents and purposes the capital of that great division of the United States which lies between the Atlantic Ocean and the Mississippi, south of Mason and Dixon's line. She is the capital city of their business, the capital city of their banking, the capital city of their affections. Washington is the Capital of the United States, but occupies no peculiar relation to the South, either geographically, politically, in banking, in commerce, or in transportation.

Baltimore has no claim to be a city of that southern division. She is north of the line which divided the North from the South, and when the day of trial came for the South, when cleavage came, when war and famine and death stalked over the Southern States, she wisely cast her fortunes with the North. We love and admire Baltimore, but she is not a city of the South. Nor can she compare with Richmond in what the two cities have done for the development of the Southern States since the conclusion of hostilities. You are old enough to remember when the railroad systems of the South were wrecked by the war and reduced to mere skeletons. You know how Virginia, reduced to poverty as she was, sacrificed the remains of her interest in the Chesapeake & Ohio, the Norfolk & Western, the Richmond & Danville, the Seaboard & Roanoke, the Richmond & Petersburg, and other railroads, in order to induce capital to come and restore them to a career of usefulness and development.

You know how the brain and money of Richmond got control of the old Richmond & Danville Railroad, connected it with Columbia in South Carolina, with Augusta in Georgia, by lease of the North Carolina Railroad, bought the Columbia & Greenville, built the Western North Carolina, purchased the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia, then built the road from Atlanta to Birmingham and to the Mississippi River for the development of all that great country.

You know, for you were the chief actor, how Richmond brains, work, and money built up and extended the great Seaboard system to develop the Southern States, and what an impetus this new system gave to progress and growth of all the cities of the South. You know, for in that, also, you have been a chief actor, how for 30 years Richmond has been slowly and painfully, but most successfully, building up a great banking business with the cities, towns, and villages of the South, until now we furnish them more money in crop-moving times than any city in the country, save perhaps New York, the financial metropolis of the whole United States.

You know, as well as I do, the affection that the southern cities cherish for Richmond, and how vehemently they are opposed to being compelled to do their banking with any other city.

You know all that I have said probably better than I do, but perhaps the other members of the committee are not familiar with the facts and, not being Virginians, will not think of them, while you, being a citizen of Richmond and a judge in the case, might feel a delicacy in urging too strenuously the interests of your own city.

Therefore it is that, feeling we have been in some degree fellow actors in the development of the ties that bind the South to Richmond, I have thought it suitable to lay the facts before you to make use of them as it may be most fitting and becoming in your position and relations to your fellow members of the committee.

Very truly, yours,

JAMES H. DOOLEY.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I do not mean to imply that Maj. Dooley's letter had the slightest influence upon the Comptroller of the Currency. Perhaps it did not, but I have had it read for this purpose, to show the manner of campaign that was conducted by Richmond to influence the selection of that city as a regional reserve city; to show why so many letters were received asking for Richmond; to show why the banks preferred Richmond; because it was a campaign of sectionalism, whereas Baltimore entered into no such campaign. Baltimore did not come down here with a great mass of people in a committee. She came down here with a select committee who knew what she had, and who could produce the data showing it to the organization committee.

She did not come here for the purpose of overwhelming the organization committee by numbers, but by facts showing why she should be selected as the location of the regional bank. Now, many of you Members——

Mr. GLASS. May I interrupt my friend?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will not yield until I get toward the end, and then I will give the gentleman plenty of opportunity to ask questions.

Many of the Members of this House are members of the bar. Many of you have tried cases in court and you have lost them, and when the opinion is handed down by the court of appeals or the Supreme Court you hardly knew your own child. Now, take the organization committee. They have thrown Baltimore down with all its commercial energy, with all of its commerce, with all its banking facilities, and with all the energy of 700,000 people. Then they come with a report and, of course, with a multiplicity of figures they can substantiate in a plausible way what they think is a correct decision.

Now, I do not pretend to know as much about banking as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], for whom I entertain the highest respect, but I do want to give a few figures on my own account.

The gentleman from Virginia seems to lay great stress upon the fact that Richmond banks loan something in the neighborhood of $33,000,000 to the southern banks, while Baltimore, he alleges, loans only about $6,000,000. I have not been fortunate enough to secure from the Treasury the figures on which the gentleman relies, although I have endeavored to do so. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that, from what I understand, the committee based its action solely upon two of a great many factors which should have entered into the problem as to what should constitute the city's volume of trade, commerce, and exchange. The two factors relied upon by the committee are, first, totals of banking capital and surplus in Baltimore and Richmond, and, secondly, the volume of loans, respectively, of these cities in the territory comprised in the district.

From what I gather from the decision of the committee, the figures considered referred to national banks solely; and it so happens that the national banks of Richmond constitute practically the entire banking capital of that city, while the national banks of Baltimore constitute only a minor portion of the great financial institutions of that metropolis. The trust companies and the savings banks constitute a far greater part of the financial interests than the national banks themselves. The total capital or surplus of Baltimore's banks is approximately $45,000,000, and the deposits and loans, including savings banks and trust companies, will total $250,000,000. Richmond has 7 national banks as against Baltimore's 15. The capital and surplus of the Richmond national banks is about $9,000,000, and the capital and surplus of the Baltimore national banks is practically $19,000,000. The individual deposits in the Richmond banks are about $25,000,000 as against Baltimore's deposits of $42,000,000. The total loan capacity of the Richmond banks is $35,000,000 as against those of Baltimore of $60,000,000. But, as I have stated, the national banks of Baltimore constitute only a portion of the great banking and saving institutions of that city. For instance, the capital of the National, State, savings, loan, and trust companies of Richmond aggregate $16,000,000 as against those of Baltimore of $47,000,000; and the individual deposits of the Richmond banks amount to about $35,000,000, while those of Baltimore amount to $90,000,000.

Mr. PLATT. One hundred and ninety million dollars.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; I should have said $190,000,000. The loans and discounts of the Richmond banks were $50,000,000, while those of Baltimore were about $118,000,000. And, as I pointed out in my remarks on the floor yesterday, approximately $200,000,000 in capital from Baltimore—from its national banks, its savings banks, and its trust companies—has been invested in the South. And three institutions alone—the Savings Bank of Baltimore, the Central Savings Bank, and the Eutaw Savings Bank—have invested in southern securities and the bonds and stocks in their vaults $23,000,000.

Mr. GLASS. Will the gentleman be interrupted now?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will ask the gentleman, as a favor, to wait until I have finished. I will be very glad to yield to him then.

Now, in addition to the assistance given by these great banks, what have we been doing for the South? Three gentlemen of Baltimore financed and put in operation that great Atlantic Coast Line system. They were Henry Walters, Frank Newcomer, and Michael Jenkins, of our city, and they still control it.

The Merchants & Miners' Transportation Co., which plies between Baltimore and many of the southern ports, and between that city and northern ports also, is likewise controlled by the city of Baltimore, through its agent, the Mercantile Trust Co.

The Seaboard Air Line, of which Maj. Dooley speaks so strongly, was originally financed by Baltimore capital, and until recently, when its ownership went to New York, was controlled by Baltimore capital.

But there is one fact which the gentleman from Virginia lays special stress upon, in which he is not fair to Baltimore, although I do not believe he intends to be unfair. He takes figures which have been given him and uses them on the floor of this House without proper explanation. For instance, he tells you that Richmond has $33,000,000 loaned to southern banks, while Baltimore has only $6,000,000 loaned.

Now, the facts are that when the committee made up these figures they took Richmond, which has a total loaning capacity of $35,000,000, and found she had loaned $33,000,000 throughout the South below the Potomac River, where she makes practically all of her loans. But when they came to calculate the figures for Baltimore, what did they do? Did they say, "You are a part of us; you are a part of the proposed fifth regional district, and you are entitled to just as much credit for all loans which you make in that district as we are?" No; not at all. They said, "Every loan you have made, although it is in the fifth regional district, if it be north of the Potomac River, you shall not have any credit for." And by this ingenious arrangement they give Baltimore credit as loaning $6,000,000 to the South, where they give Richmond credit for loaning $33,000,000 to the South. The truth of the situation is that if you include and give Baltimore consideration equal to that given Richmond for all the money she loans throughout the South, including Maryland, which is a part of the district, you will find that the total loans of Baltimore in the district and the other Southern States approximate nearly $119,000,000 instead of $6,000,000, as against Richmond's $33,000,000.

Mr. GLASS. Will my friend explain, if that is true, why they could not get a bank in North Carolina or in South Carolina?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I can explain that very well. Just read Mr. Dooley's letter and find out why they could not get a bank in the State of South Carolina.

There is another factor which enters into this matter, which I do not think is fair. You take a bank, and what has it for sale? Its credit. You take a business house, a merchandise house, and what has it for sale? Its merchandise. Therefore I say that in the selection of a regional-bank site it was not fair to say "we will consider merely what the national banks have for sale, to wit, credit," and not consider business.

If merchandise houses in Baltimore sell $50,000,000 of goods in the South on credit, is it not giving to the South just $50,000,000 worth of loans, just the same as if a bank loaned $50,000,000 in the South? What is the difference? And if I produce to you facts showing that Baltimore does ten times the business throughout the Southern States that Richmond does, am I not entitled to consideration for the goods which I send down there on credit, just the same as I would be for money loaned down there on credit?

But the committee did not do that. They cut us out of our trust companies; they cut us out of our savings institutions; they cut us out of our great business transactions; they cut us out of our great commerce, our imports, and our exports, and limit us to loans made south of the Potomac River by our national banks, and then say, in the face of a decision thus reached, that we ought to be satisfied. I would be very foolish if I sat in this House and let it be understood that Baltimore is satisfied when she is not. I was never asked to do anything toward securing the location of this bank in Baltimore or in Richmond. We did not attempt to use any political lever in the matter. We did not ask a single official or politician, or any man who might have had "a pull," to come down here and urge action in our behalf. My people came down here with a solid business proposition, with a committee of gentlemen who understood the situation and who were capable of laying the proposition before the organization committee in a business way, and they said, "Here are our goods. Here is what we loan. Here is the business we do. Here is our commerce, our exports, and our imports, and we ask you as the great metropolis of the South to give us a regional bank on the strength of this showing, and not on account of any plea of sectionalism, of any political pull, or considerations of any other character except our actual figures."

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. I ask the gentleman if there is a single influential banker or business man outside of the State of Maryland in the territory covered by the regional reserve bank who has asked for the location at Baltimore?

Mr. LINTHICUM. That is what I say. We did not come down here trying to make an exhibition of influence. We came to the committee with the goods, and showed that we were entitled to this bank upon the basis of the fact that we are the business center of the district, and that we traded with the people of that district and loaned them money and built their railroads, and own and run the steamship lines, and helped to build up that country of the South, even though we are said by Maj. Dooley to have separated from it during the war. We did not. One of my colleagues from my State went down there and fought with the people of that section during the war. Our people did not have to go down there, but they went down there on their own volition and fought side by side with the people of Virginia, and there ought not to have been the slightest sectionalism in this proposition. It ought to have been determined on its merits and the location and the business of our great city of Baltimore.

Mr. GLASS. Will the gentleman yield further?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GLASS. I am quite agreed with the gentleman that there ought not to have been any sectionalism in it, and I do not believe now that sectionalism had anything to do with the selection of the bank. John Skelton Williams may have done Mr. Dooley the courtesy of reading his letter, but I doubt if any other member of the board ever saw it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all those who have spoken on this bill be allowed the same privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will put the question, but he doubts very much the power of the Committee of the Whole to grant that request.

Mr. MANN. The committee has not that power.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think it has.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Maryland yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will ask the gentleman if he saw the printed brief presented by the bankers of the city of Richmond to this board?

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; I have not been able to get it, and I have not been able to get many other figures upon which the selection was based.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It will be a great pleasure for me to supply it to the gentleman.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Oh, it is a great pleasure to the gentleman to supply me with information after the damage has been done.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Why did the gentleman not make his speech before it was done instead of after?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I did not have a grievance before.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And you did not have the facts before.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Did the gentleman notice in the speech of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] that where Baltimore loaned $1,000,000 in the State of Virginia the State of Virginia had $3,000,000 on deposit in Baltimore? Does not that prove that Baltimore is the banking city of Virginia?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I think so.

Mr. AINEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask a question of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. AINEY. I am very much interested in the method pursued in establishing these regional banks and in the explanation that the gentleman has made, showing that no political considerations entered into the selection. I would like to ask the gentleman if I understood him correctly in the suggestion that I thought he made, that the sentiment of the banks in the several districts was taken and guided largely in the selection of the regional banks in each particular district? Am I correct in that?

Mr. GLASS. I assumed that. The gentleman can determine that for himself.

Mr. AINEY. Well, in view of that statement, which he assumed and uttered on the floor of the House, I would like to ask him in regard to the district in which Pittsburgh is located. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that 940 of the banks in that district were favorable to Pittsburgh and an equal number favorable to Cincinnati, and yet that Cleveland, the place selected, had a bad third of only 345? I would be glad to hear the gentleman explain what consideration entered into the selection of Cleveland within which to locate the regional bank, going by the magnificent city of Pittsburgh which had nearly three times the local support from banks of the district?

Mr. GLASS. I have had no occasion to examine that poll or to undertake to determine why Cleveland was selected rather than Pittsburgh. But if I lived in Pennsylvania you may be sure I would know about it.

Mr. AINEY. I am sure that if the gentleman lived in Pennsylvania and had as much opportunity as most Pennsylvanians have had he would not have had much to say.

Mr. GLASS. The gentleman has had the same opportunity that I have had.

Mr. AINEY. Then I assume that the gentleman on the other side is in a very bad situation if he has not had any more opportunity to obtain information than we have had.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that an editorial from the Baltimore Sun of April 3 be read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A DEEP INJUSTICE TO BALTIMORE.

If there are any sufficient reasons for passing Baltimore over and selecting Richmond as the location for one of the regional banks, these reasons do not lie on the surface of the situation nor are they developed in the explanation which accompanies the official announcement. That the chief city of the South, and the only city that bears a relation to the whole South should have been thrust aside in favor of a State capital, with no solid claim to real commercial influence extending beyond its immediate neighborhood, almost passes belief.

The Sun holds Richmond and the State of Virginia in deep affection, but to set that lovely State capital up as a rival to Baltimore in finance, commerce, industry, and general importance would be absurd on its face.

The fact that has been harped upon that the Richmond national banks carried, in the last report to the comptroller, a larger aggregate of loans in the South than the Baltimore banks affords altogether too slender a claim upon which to award the financial headquarters of this section.

We venture to say that in the essentials of financial and general business relationship with the South the proportion is 5 to 1—perhaps as much as 10 to 1—in favor of Baltimore.

If we consider those actual business transactions which form the true measure of relationship, Baltimore is as much ahead of Richmond as Richmond is of Danville. And when the vast sums advanced by our trust companies and financiers and the permanent investment in mines, mills, railroads, municipal, county, and State securities, and similar things are considered the comparison becomes even more overwhelming.

Baltimore is bound by many ties of sentiment to the Wilson administration. But Baltimore asks no favors. It was willing to have its interests sacrificed, if necessary, to convenience and efficiency in the system of regional banks. Baltimore's first wish was for the success of the administration in its great plans for currency reform. For itself it would have been satisfied with simple justice or less. What it has got is humiliation added to injustice.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, at no time during the discussion of the currency bill or at any other time did I ever expect that the location of the Federal reserve banks would bring forth such utterances as are incorporated in the resolutions passed by a mass meeting in the city of New Orleans on the night of the 4th instant. These resolutions are insulting, they are slanderous, they are utterly selfish, and in most instances they are unfounded in fact. They perform the "baby act" in all that term implies.

As a matter of fact, I congratulate the Federal Reserve Board on selecting Richmond and Dallas. I will not say anything at this particular time about Atlanta; but on one occasion I visited the city of Dallas, and as I walked over that thrifty, beautiful city I said, "Oh, how much like Atlanta Dallas is. It is almost a twin city for it. Some of these days the city of Atlanta and the city of Dallas will be recognized as two of the greatest and most thrifty and up-to-date cities in the South." This prediction made 10 years ago was verified by the action of the Federal Reserve Board in their selections of Dallas and Atlanta. On my way back from Dallas I stopped over in New Orleans.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Not right now.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I want to say to the gentleman that his pronunciation is incorrect. It is New *Or*leans, with the accent on the first syllable, not New Or*leans*, with the accent on the last syllable.

Mr. HOWARD. To satisfy the gentleman, then, I will say New *Or*leans. As I strolled down the street and got a whiff of the fragrance of the magnolia blossoms and saw the citizens moseying along the street like they were all afflicted with "slow" fever or some other malady, I said: "What a magnificent place to spend my old age; what a peaceful, restful place to die; and what a peaceful, restful place to sleep in forever." [Laughter.] I found out that when they bury a man in New Orleans the minister could not truthfully repeat the burial service of my church and say, "Earth to earth, ashes to ashes," because in New Orleans they bury everybody above ground. They do not have dirt enough there to bury their dead in. Then I found out another thing while I was in New Orleans—that the people were so busy in the daytime fighting for the existence of the city, to keep it from being washed out into the Gulf of Mexico, and so busy fighting the gallnippers and mosquitoes at night that they do not have much energy to follow any other occupation. The result of this wail of New Orleans and Baltimore convinces me that these old seaport towns, Baltimore and New Orleans, are taking themselves a little bit too seriously. They are trying to go on the reputation that they enjoyed away back yonder in the Revolutionary days, in the days before the war. You know you can pitch shot to a little toad frog, and he will open his mouth and take them in as long as he does not have to move or do anything except open his mouth; and so New Orleans has been sitting at the mouth of the Mississippi River, taking in everything on the face of the earth that floated down the river, without exerting any energy herself, and she has been content to do that without making any struggle to keep her place with the other progressive cities of the South.

But, sir, I happen to represent a city of the new South, the capital city of the Empire State of the South, a city that is only 50 years old, a city that was left in ashes in 1864, so devastated by the consequences of war a crow could not have gotten a decent meal in the city of Atlanta after the 22d of July, 1864. Now, let us see whether or not this Federal Reserve Board played politics in the location of the banks at Richmond, at Atlanta, and at Dallas, as charged in these rampant, ill-tempered resolutions. Now, I might argue that it would be unnecessary for me to go any further than to relate these facts: According to the census of 1910 the population of Atlanta was 154,839. During the period from 1900 to 1910 its increase in population was 75 per cent. The population of New Orleans in 1910 was 340,000. Between 1900 and 1910 it only increased 18 per cent. At the normal increase of 18 per cent in 10 years New Orleans would now have 360,000 people and Atlanta would have a population, at an increase of 75 per cent, of about 220,000.

Here is an unbiased witness for Atlanta, indicating her business activities as compared to New Orleans. The postal receipts of the great city of Atlanta for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913—the insignificant city mentioned in the resolutions passed in New Orleans—were $1,328,193. The postal receipts for the city of New Orleans for the same period were $1,182,285. A city with nearly twice the population and claiming nearly twice the commerce of the city of Atlanta has nearly $200,000 less postal receipts than the city of Atlanta.

Mr. ELDER. Mostly spent in advertising Coca Cola.

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman talks about Coca Cola. The main reason for manufacturing Coca Cola is to put a little ginger into the people of Louisiana. [Laughter.] It is somewhat of a stimulant and a great tonic for physical inertia, and that is the reason we have had such success in selling Coca Cola. The manufacture of Coca Cola in Atlanta is a great industry. I suppose they make more money in a year than any other corporation, with the same capital invested, in the United States of America, and the reason they make it is because so many of you folks in New Orleans have to drink it to keep awake and moving.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HOWARD. Not now. Mr. Chairman, these resolutions say that New Orleans has more banking capital than Dallas and Atlanta put together, but that is not so. The national banking capital of Atlanta is $8,600,000, and the national banking capital of the city of New Orleans is only $6,720,000.

Mr. ELDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Not right now.

Mr. ELDER. Will the gentleman give the deposits in all the banks instead of picking out the national banks?

Mr. HOWARD. I am talking about national bank capital upon which these locations were predicated.

Mr. ELDER. State banks are permitted to come in.

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, Mr. Chairman, if we should count the State banks in Atlanta and Georgia, we would double and treble you. If we had figured the capital of State banks in our showing, we would have gotten a reserve bank for Georgia alone and would not have needed any district outside of Georgia. [Laughter.] From 1903 to 1913 the national banking capital of Atlanta increased 400 per cent, and the national banking capital of that dear, dreamy, old city of New Orleans increased 17 per cent during the same time. Atlanta will contribute to the capital stock of this regional reserve bank $113,000 more than your blessed, dear, old, sainted city of New Orleans. The State of Georgia alone has a national banking capital of $24,615,910, and it will contribute to the capital of this regional reserve bank in the sixth district one-third of the entire amount.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has ably defended Richmond as against Baltimore, and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] has read that piece of Revolutionary history into the RECORD, for what purpose the Lord only knows. If it illustrates this issue, I fail to see it. So I will not say anything about Baltimore, because Atlanta has no fight with Baltimore. She has no fight with New Orleans. She is simply defending herself against an unwarranted attack made by the citizens of New Orleans upon her commercial importance. I very deeply regret that New Orleans could not get one of these banks. If they had not gone to sleep, if they had kept on doing like we have done in the city of Atlanta, progressed, kept on building, and if they had not depended on the cities up the Mississippi River to feed them, like Elisha of old depended upon the ravens, and had quit blowing so much about what they had done in the past, probably they would have gotten a bank. The attitude of New Orleans reminds me of the story of the Atlanta man and the Savannah man who were blowing all the time about their respective cities. They got into a colloquy about their cities, and the fellow from Atlanta said to the fellow from Savannah, "If Atlanta could suck as hard as Savannah could blow, they would have the Savannah River up there in 24 hours." [Laughter.] Now, if Atlanta could suck as hard as New Orleans can blow, we would have the mouth of the Mississippi in the interior of Georgia. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDER. Does not the gentleman think that if we do not watch you and you keep up the present procedure, you will get the mouth of the Mississippi over there?

Mr. HOWARD. Well, if I am doing anything in that respect, I am blowing and not sucking. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, in the last 10 years in the city of Atlanta, the deposits in the Atlanta national banks have increased 500 per cent and the clearings have increased 600 per cent. These figures amount to exactly ten times as much as the increase in the city of New Orleans during the same period. Individual loans, discounts, deposits, and clearings of Atlanta national banks are larger than those of New Orleans.

Now, there is something in the law about the location of banks at places where they are most convenient to the business and banking interests. There are going in and out of the city of Atlanta 152 trains a day carrying mail. There is not a point in this sixth district that can not receive the mail of the regional bank from Atlanta from the time the bank closes in the afternoon until the opening hour of the bank the next day. That, I presume, was taken into consideration by the Federal Reserve Board in making the apportionment of regional banks throughout the country.

Mr. Chairman, another thing, Atlanta is one of the greatest markets in the Southeastern States. Its commerce last year was over $340,000,000. Now, let us see whether the Federal Reserve Board has acted unwisely and unfairly to New Orleans in establishing a Federal reserve bank in Atlanta. Let us see how great corporations and the Government itself consider Atlanta as a vantage point for the transaction of business. At Atlanta the railroads of the southeastern section have located their headquarters. At Atlanta is the headquarters of the Southeastern Passenger Association, extending from the Potomac and Ohio Rivers to the Mississippi River. At Atlanta is the headquarters of the southeastern freight bureau. At Atlanta is located the southern weighing and inspection bureau, covering the same territory. At Atlanta is the headquarters of the telephone system of the same section. At Atlanta are the headquarters of the telegraph companies for the same section. At Atlanta the headquarters of the express companies for the South are located. At Atlanta are the headquarters for the agents of the great manufacturing institutions, over 450 in number; all are important manufacturing and commercial houses in the United States.

Our National Government, Mr. Chairman, recognizes the importance of the city of Atlanta. It is the headquarters of the fourth division of Railway Mail Service. It is the headquarters of the military department of the South, and Atlanta has been designated as the headquarters of the new Bureau of Commerce, covering all this section, including New Orleans.

Now, we have got another great institution down there where we have to entertain, not in the very highest style, but we do entertain them continually—in fact, we have always got somebody in attendance upon them while sojourning in our city. We have several distinguished citizens from New Orleans with us in the Atlanta Penitentiary. [Laughter.]

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Not right now.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I simply wanted to say that if Munchausenism was a crime, the gentleman from Atlanta might remain at home. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWARD. Well, Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman is laboring hard to make a "pint," but I do not see it. But since he is getting restless about this showing we are making for Atlanta, I might with propriety say that if Munchausenism was a Federal offense, those who attended that mass meeting and passed those resolutions would soon become temporary citizens of Atlanta.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has enumerated a great many valuable things at Atlanta, but he has omitted one. The gentleman did not enumerate himself. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HOWARD. I appreciate the fact that if I were to mention myself I would mention the least valuable product of my great city. I am here replying to these resolutions, not to my good friend from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ] or to my good friend Gen. ESTOPINAL. The only complaint I have to make against my friend the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ] is that he was inveigled, notwithstanding his brilliant intellect and ever-present sense of fairness, into putting into the RECORD this set of hot-headed and ill-considered resolutions passed by some people in New Orleans who were as irritated as a setting hen and just blazed away and charged the whole world with corruption.

The only person that I know of connected with politics one way or the other presenting Atlanta to the board for consideration was the senior Senator from Georgia, Hon. HOKE SMITH. When this board visited Atlanta he appeared before them with a good case, and he ably presented the overwhelming facts in favor of Atlanta. This was all that was done by anyone connected with Congress one way or the other. Why play politics with Atlanta and Georgia when she is already solidly Democratic? If politics were being played and converts to tariff reform were being sought by the present administration, there was no place in the South that presented a more fertile field for the administration than Louisiana and New Orleans.

I do not think these resolutions have done New Orleans any good, and I know it has weakened the gentleman's case, if he ever had a case, because the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] absolutely annihilated him, and when the facts come out, the cold-blooded facts, not rumors that are gathered at random by a crowd of citizens who have lost their reason because they are chagrined at the action of the Federal Reserve Board—when the cold facts come out I think the gentleman will find that he has hurt himself by casting insinuations in respect to the commercial standing, the wealth, and the locaton of two of New Orleans' sister cities, Atlanta and Dallas.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. If that is the case, may I ask the gentleman why he is consuming so much of this valuable time in refuting arguments presented in these resolutions?

Mr. HOWARD. Because of the fact the gentleman has caused to be inserted in the RECORD resolutions reflecting upon the commercial integrity of my city and upon those in high office who located a regional bank in that city in the interest of commerce. I am doing exactly what the gentleman would do if he were placed in the same position in which I have been placed. I represent a great business city, and the gentleman from Louisiana knows it. We made a clean, fair fight against New Orleans and won. The Federal Reserve Board visited New Orleans and it visited Atlanta and they saw the difference between the dreamy-eyed people of New Orleans and the bright-eyed thrifty business men of Atlanta, and that settled it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DUPRÉ. When it comes to a matter of eyes I am willing to submit mine as against the gentleman's.

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, I know the gentleman possesses those fathomless, dreamy eyes that will attract most anyone who takes much stock in eyes, and I hope the gentleman some day will get close enough to some beautiful Louisiana girl that she may look in those eyes and become enamored thereby, and that he may take her unto himself. [Laughter and applause.] I know that the gentleman's eyes are resistless, but, Mr. Chairman, on yesterday, when these resolutions were put into the RECORD, I happened to be out of the Chamber on account of the illness of one of my children. Had I been here I would have replied then to the gentleman from Louisiana—not to him, but to those he was anxious to represent by putting into the RECORD an unfounded statement, a calumny against the city of Richmond, the city of Atlanta, and the city of Dallas.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman has been kind enough to mention Baltimore in his remarks. I would like to ask him whether he knows that that great monopoly of Coca Cola in his town, recognizing the advantages of Baltimore as a shipping center between the West and other sections of the country, has come there and located a building and factory costing about $500,000?

Mr. HOWARD. Why, yes; and not only that, but the Coca Cola Co. has half a million dollars invested in Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Chicago, and San Francisco.

The Coca Cola Co. has money scattered all over the United States, because it has so much of it, and you people in Baltimore needed it so badly that the Coca Cola Co. came and put $500,000 in your town. [Laughter.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. I wish the gentleman would bring up $500,000 more.

Mr. HOWARD. That is one corporation that is making money. High-toned, conscientious, and intelligent gentlemen own the stock, and they are illustrative of the "Atlanta spirit."

Mr. SLOAN. That is under this administration.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes; and it has made it under the other administration as well as under this; and there is not any tariff or currency law or any demagoguery practiced by the other side about canal tolls or anything else that can keep the Coca Cola Co. from making money. It is doing a great deal of good in building up our section, and a great many people in other cities have tried to put it out of business, but they can not do it. This is one corporation run on the square. So much for the Federal Reserve Bank Board and the establishment of the regional banks.

Mr. Chairman, I know that I voice the sentiment of the people whom I have the honor to represent when I say that they feel that this bill reported by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS], who had nothing to do with this attack on the city of Atlanta, the city of Dallas, or the city of Richmond, ought to pass. We feel that every vote practically on the other side of the Chamber will be cast in its favor.

It is true that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has made some comments upon the bill, one or two of them well taken, but they have got about $4,600,000 in the Treasury, which has been lying dormant, doing nobody any good for 50 years. There are several people in my district to whom it would do a lot of good—one a poor, old lady who had 115 bales of cotton taken from her husband after the 30th day of June, 1865, and cotton then was worth about 50 cents a pound. The money is in the Treasury, and she is practically in the poorhouse, and she needs the money. The Government can not use the money, at least it has not used it, and it has no authority to use it under the act of 1863, as I understand it. I can not see any possible injustice that can be done in the gentlemen on the other side allowing this bill to pass unanimously. There is nothing in it that can hurt anybody, but there is a lot in it that will help a lot of worthy citizens in the State of Georgia and in the other 11 great cotton States of the South. They need this money and have needed it from the time it was collected. It is a dormant fund, and, as I said a moment ago, it is doing nobody any good, and why should not this bill pass and these people be allowed to collect that money?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman refers to this money lying dormant in the Treasury. Does not the gentleman know that if the money is paid out of the Treasury it would have to be raised by taxation hereafter collected?

Mr. HOWARD. I may be laboring under a misapprehension.

Mr. DUPRÉ. As the gentleman is with regard to Atlanta.

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, no. If I were laboring under no greater misapprehension than when I was talking about Atlanta, I would not consume the time in trying to seek information from the distinguished gentleman from Illinois—something the gentleman from Louisiana very seldom seeks, and very seldom obtains. I say, Mr. Chairman, I may be laboring a misapprehension. I understood the gentleman from Louisiana, the chairman of the committee, to say this morning that this was either abandoned or lost property, that under the act of 1863—probably that may not be the act——

Mr. MANN. The act of 1863.

Mr. HOWARD. They gathered together this property, and it was ordered sold and the money placed in the Treasury for the benefit of the original owners.

Mr. MANN. That is correct.

Mr. HOWARD. Now, as the money was acquired, less the actual expense of marketing, let us see where it would be necessary to tax anybody to raise that particular amount now.

Mr. MANN. Well, that particular money is not in the Treasury now. There is a credit in the Treasury, that is all; something like the banking business.

Mr. HOWARD. But I understood the gentleman called it taxation.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; any money that is paid out of the Treasury has to be raised by taxation.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not think the gentleman understood me. I say this particular amount placed in the Treasury in 1865 was raised without any procedure of taxation.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HOWARD. There was then a credit to the people——

Mr. MANN. That may be——

Mr. HOWARD (continuing). And instead of raising that much money by taxation the Government has simply used that fund to pay off certain obligations, and that fund should still be intact to comply with the act of 1863.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman stated that the money was lying in the Treasury dormant, doing no good. If there is any large sum in the Treasury lying dormant a great many people on that side of the House would like to discover it. [Applause.]

Mr. HOWARD. I am sure——

Mr. MANN. The fact is there is no large—that is, no excessive—working balance in the Treasury, and all the money that is in the Treasury, from whatever source it comes, is carried in the one fund. There are a few special funds which are not included in this.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. RUCKER. I desire to be recognized in my own right.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the floor.

Mr. ESTOPINAL. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri at this time.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say this debate is very interesting. I am glad to hear the glories of Atlanta proclaimed. I hope New Orleans has been aroused and awakened from her slumbers; but it seems to me this procedure has become a farce, with all respect to gentlemen here. Calendar Wednesday was set apart and heralded all over the broad land as a great parliamentary triumph, after a brilliant fight for a rule that would permit us to transact business. We were promised that there would be one day each week on which Members could secure recognition for the transaction of the public business. And to-day, upon the call of committees, a bill, a very important bill, was called up, and I am quite sure I am conservative when I say that out of nearly five hours of debate not 30 minutes has been devoted to that important bill, one that ought to pass and which ought to have been enacted into law many years ago. Longer delay is a serious reflection upon the honor and integrity of the Nation; and yet gentlemen whose constituents are now knocking at the doors of Congress and who have been trying for years to obtain from the Government money that is justly theirs as original claimants or as heirs of those whose property was taken are being delayed by gentlemen who have been talking here about everything under the sun except that bill. I want to say I am disposed to insist hereafter that we have a quorum on these "holy Calendar Wednesdays," confine our debate to the bill under consideration, or adjourn.

For four or five weeks I have been waiting to secure consideration of a bill of national importance, but I can not get it before this House. Why? Because Calendar Wednesday is consumed by gentlemen who want to speak on every question except the pending bill. Committees have called up bills, it is true, but the time of the House has been taken by gentlemen in talking about everything under the heavens except the bill before the House. It is an outrage; it is an injustice; and the time has come when this course should stop. We act more like big boys than like full-grown men. We have no right to waste the time of this Congress in mere speech making when there are so many measures pending that some Members really want considered and the country is demanding that we do consider. And I am inclined to think there is less than a quorum of Members here now. Mr. Chairman, I may be forced, in order that one committee may not hold the floor during all the summer, to make the point of no quorum and renew it next Wednesday, and keep up such tactics in order that this day may not be lost each week. I do not make the point of no quorum now, but I want to give notice to gentlemen that if they really want this bill passed they should cease talking about the dead past and talk about this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. ESTOPINAL. Mr. Chairman, I want to assure the gentleman I will consume very little of the time of the committee, and I can assure the House that it was not my desire to speak, but I feel it incumbent upon me to make some statement in regard to the question that has been discussed to-day—location of the regional reserve banks and the protest of the people of New Orleans. I thought this was a closed incident, as far as this House was concerned, at adjournment yesterday, but it is brought up again this morning, and I much regret it. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, how they reached the formation of these districts. My impression is that they must have selected the cities first and then made the districts to fit. I can conceive of no other way. In my own State of Louisiana they have divided it and amputated some of the parishes, a most extraordinary way of reaching the formation of a territory for the purposes intended by the act. The location of these reserve banks was presumed to have been based on the number of banks in the region voting for its choice, but that supposition has been exploded in the case of Pittsburgh and Cincinnati as against Cleveland, the latter city receiving but one-third the number of votes received by either of the other two. Therefore it can not be for that reason. And as between New Orleans and Atlanta, it can not be for the reason that Atlanta has larger capital than New Orleans, because that is disproved by the facts. I have the figures here. The deposits in the banks of New Orleans amount to $80,000,000; in Atlanta, $33,000,000. The capital and surplus in New Orleans $18,000,000 and in Atlanta $15,000,000. The total resources of New Orleans, $110,000,000; Atlanta, $51,000,000. Now, if figures count for anything—and the figures are not disputed by anybody—it seems to me New Orleans should have had one of these banks. Besides that, there is the location of New Orleans. It would be the only great seaport between Philadelphia on the Atlantic and San Francisco on the Pacific coast with a reserve bank, and should for that reason have had one of these banks. There is no question about it, and any thinking man, any reasonable man, any man who is not biased, will admit it.

We have great business interests in New Orleans, and we have probably the best port facilities of any city in the United States, with the exception of New York, and we have our own belt-line railroad, which distributes merchandise to and from any part of the wharves. I believe New Orleans is the only city in the Union which has one. She will now become, what she formerly was, the greatest cotton mart of the country, for the State of Louisiana has just voted a bond issue of $10,000,000 for cotton warehouses, and with these facilities New Orleans will secure and hold the bulk of the cotton business of the country. New Orleans is the great seaport of the Mississippi Valley, the gateway of the commerce of that great valley. Her commerce will increase unquestionably more than that of any other city by the traffic through the Panama Canal.

Then why did the inference find lodgment in the minds of the members of this organization board that New Orleans is bound to stand still while the other cities will go ahead. Is it not more reasonable to suppose that Atlanta has more nearly reached her limitation? I believe she has. She has not the commercial facilities for expansion like a great seaport with a well-established foreign commerce. In manufactures the activities of New Orleans are three times as great as Atlanta. I have here a brief that was presented to the board. It was prepared by experts. I will not read it to the committee, but I would like to insert it in the RECORD, and therefore, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD this brief that was presented to the board by the representatives of New Orleans.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BOOHER). The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD certain documents which he has mentioned. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ESTOPINAL. The following are the documents to which I have referred:

NEW ORLEANS THE LOGICAL POINT FOR THE LOCATION OF THE REGIONAL BANK.

[Delivered by Sol Wexler before the committee on regional banks.]

In view of my active interest in the provisions of the Federal reserve act and my familiarity with the many problems which it embraces, I am sure no one realizes more than I do the grave difficulties with which you are beset and the tremendous responsibilities which have been thrust upon you as the organization committee charged with the inauguration and installation of an entirely new system of currency and banking in this country. I realize more than most men the excellence, the importance, and beneficent results that will obtain from the Federal reserve act and how much credit and gratitude is due the present Democratic administration and the chairman of this committee by the whole American people for its speedy enactment into law and for the excellence and soundness of its provisions.

In advocating the city of New Orleans as the only fitting and logical location for a regional bank to serve the vast territory embraced in what is known as the Gulf and contiguous States, I have given the most careful consideration to the claims of our sister cities and States for the definite purpose of ascertaining if I have been blinded by local patriotism in my conclusions and with the full intention, if I found the claims of any other city in this territory superior to that of New Orleans, to lay aside civic ambition and yield our claims for the common good. No patriotic citizen of this country and no good adherent of the Democratic Party has the right to approach this subject from any other standpoint than that of disinterestedness and altruism, for the success of the system of banking and currency which we are about to install involves the welfare of this and future generations, the future success of our party, and the financial and commercial supremacy of the Nation.

But the consideration and study of the reasons for the location of a bank here in connection with and in comparison with those of any city within a thousand miles of us gives no cause for hesitation in placing before you the following important facts immediately bearing upon and pertinent to the subject.

We believe that the territory to be served by New Orleans should embrace all that territory shown on this map within the red lines thereon, radiating from Louisiana, as the center, westward to the line of New Mexico, thus taking in the State of Texas; eastward to the Atlantic Ocean, taking in the States of Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, and Georgia; and northward, taking in that part of the State of Tennessee lying west of the Tennessee River. This territory contains 860 national banks with an aggregate capital and surplus of $148,900,000, capable of furnishing a capital to the regional bank, based upon 6 per cent, of $8,900,000, and deposits, based upon 5 per cent, of an aggregate of $473,500,000, without counting Government deposits of $24,000,000.

We estimate that in the same territory State banks and trust companies have an aggregate capital and surplus, according to the comptroller's report (all banks not being represented), of $130,000,000; which, if 50 per cent of them came into the system, which I believe to be a conservative estimate, would give an additional capital of $3,900,000 and additional deposits of $8,000,000, or, combined with the national banks—

Regional bank.

LIABILITIES.

Capital of	$12,800,000
Deposits of	32,000,000
Circulation	82,500,000
Discounts (profit and loss)	760,000
	128,060,000

RESOURCES.

Gold against deposits (35 per cent of $32,000,000)	11,200,000
Gold against Federal-reserve notes issued (40 per cent of $82,500,000)	33,000,000
Bills discounted	83,600,000
Balance gold on hand	260,000
	128,060,000

And as the total bills payable, as shown by the comptroller's report, of all of the banks in Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, and Georgia, for the last year, at the maximum period, only aggregate $34,600,000, it can be readily seen that the statement that a regional bank located in New Orleans could not take care of the business is an absurdity.

N. B.—United States deposits are not included in this calculation.

In this territory the most remote city having a national bank to the west of us would be El Paso, Tex., 1,192 miles, or 36 hours; to the east, Brunswick, Ga., 689 miles, or 26 hours and 40 minutes; to the north, Paris, Tenn., 529 miles, or 16 hours and 10 minutes. Such most western city would be nearer Houston by only 362 miles, farther from Atlanta by 857 miles, farther from Birmingham by 777 miles, farther from Memphis by 758 miles.

The territory above described is connected with New Orleans by Western Union and Postal Telegraph lines and long-distance telephone; as far as the mouth of the Rio Grande River, by sea; and by rail by the Southern Pacific and its many connections, Texas & Pacific and its many connections, St. Louis & San Francisco and its many connections, New Orleans, Texas & Mexico and its many connections, Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe and its many connections, and Louisiana Railway & Navigation Co.; to the eastward by the Louisville & Nashville and its many connections, Southern Railway and its many connections, Mobile & Ohio and its many connections, Queen & Crescent system and its many connections, New Orleans, Mobile & Chicago (now building into New Orleans), New Orleans Great Northern, and Gulf & Ship Island; to the northward by the Illinois Central and its many connections, Yazoo & Mississippi Valley and its many connections, and Louisville & Nashville.

The entire territory is also in connection with New Orleans by steamboat and barge transportation through the Intercoastal Canal being built by the United States Government, now constructed from Texas almost to New Orleans, and proposed to be constructed from New Orleans eastward to Pensacola, which will put New Orleans in communication with points along the Sabine, Calcasieu, and Mermentau Rivers to the west without going into the open sea. At the present time New Orleans reaches the territory lying along the Pearl River, Amite River, Pascagoula River, Warrior and Alabama Rivers, all connected with the Mississippi River through Lake Borgne Canal. The Mississippi River, running through the city of New Orleans to the Gulf, puts it in connection with the Red, Arkansas, White, Ohio, Missouri, and Illinois Rivers and with all of their tributaries, so that probably no city in this country affords such varied, extensive, and competitive transportation facilities to the domestic territory it will serve by rail, sea, river, and canal as the city of New Orleans.

But if in your wisdom and as a result of your investigations you should see fit to exclude from this territory the State of Georgia on the east, you would reduce the capital of the regional bank located here, according to the comptroller's figures, all banks not being represented, only $2,421,000, and its deposits $4,532,000; and if, in addition to Georgia, you saw fit to exclude that part of Texas claimed by St. Louis, Denver, and Kansas City, lying west of Austin, you would reduce the capital of the regional bank $1,133,000 and the deposits $2,774,000; and, again, if you say fit to exclude the part of Tennessee lying west of the Tennessee River, you would reduce the capital $591,000 and the deposits $1,657,000; or, if you eliminated all three of the last-named sections, the total reduction of capital arising from National and State banks would only be $2,598,000 and deposits $6,240,000, leaving, if one, two, or three were eliminated, the following capital and deposits:

Territory.	National banks.		State banks.
	Capital.	Deposits.	Capital.	Deposits.
Entire territory	$8,900,000	$24,000,000	$3,900,000	$8,000,000
Excluding Georgia	7,430,000	20,800,000	2,949,000	6,668,000
Excluding west Texas	7,952,000	21,515,000	3,715,000	7,711,000
Excluding west Tennessee	8,720,000	23,445,000	3,489,000	6,897,000
Excluding Georgia and west Texas	6,482,000	18,315,000	2,764,000	6,379,000
Excluding Georgia and west Tennessee	7,250,000	20,245,000	2,538,000	5,567,000
Excluding west Texas and west Tennessee	7,772,000	20,960,000	3,304,000	6,608,000
Excluding Georgia, west Texas, and west Tennessee	6,302,000	17,760,000	2,353,000	5,276,000

The present banking capital and surplus and deposits of New Orleans as compared with the cities of Atlanta, Houston, Birmingham, and Memphis are as follows:

City.	Capital and surplus and undivided profits.	Deposits.
New Orleans	$18,797,000	$86,032,110
Atlanta	15,000,000	33,000,000
Houston	13,400,000	42,000,000
Birmingham	7,083,100	27,289,000
Memphis	8,804,600	35,130,000

The comparative total resources are as follows:

Cities and total resources.

New Orleans	$110,000,000
Atlanta	51,000,000
Houston	57,000,000
Birmingham	35,510,000
Memphis	45,934,000

The capital and surplus of the regional bank to be located here, taking in the territory only embraced in the yellow lines shown on the map, will be $8,655,000 capital and $23,036,000 deposits.

A statement of the comparative distances of the principal cities from New Orleans is as follows:

	Miles.
From New Orleans to Mobile	141
From New Orleans to Pensacola	243
From New Orleans to Atlanta	495
From New Orleans to Montgomery	318
From New Orleans to Birmingham	415
From New Orleans to Chattanooga	498
From New Orleans to Nashville	622
From New Orleans to Memphis	396

From New Orleans to Little Rock	487
From New Orleans to Dallas	515
From New Orleans to Austin	528
From New Orleans to Houston	362
From New Orleans to San Antonio	571
From New Orleans to Galveston	412

The establishment under the old law of central reserve cities created an artificial flow of money into the central reserve cities not justified by the natural course of finance and of commerce, but which after many years came to be regarded as natural, and which will invert to natural local channels just as soon as the compulsory feature is removed; and as the natural channel to which money should flow is to the point from which it can be most readily and quickly obtained and to which the products grown, manufactured, and exported drift. The points from which a section purchases its supplies have an insignificant effect upon the trend of money, for the exchange created by the shipment of a carload of hay from a Texas point to North Carolina can be converted into cash more quickly by depositing it with its local bank, and it in turn with the regional bank or with its nearest correspondent, which for the territory referred to would be New Orleans, though in respect to distribution of merchandise New Orleans is many millions in excess of any other city under consideration at this session.

This bill, as I understand its provisions, is intended to decentralize the control of money and credit under central control, and to attach to the city of St. Louis the great States of Texas, Mississippi, Louisiana, west Tennessee, in addition to its legitimate territory, would absolutely defeat the purpose of the bill and concentrate in one city a control never intended either by nature geographically nor by the framers of the bill. To place a regional bank in Birmingham or in Memphis or in Houston would be to create an impossibly weak bank in relatively small inland industrial cities having neither knowledge or experience in international trade nor in the handling of the variety of merchandise—the production of our own country and that of every country on the globe, such as comes to the port of New Orleans, and could be properly compared to placing a regional bank in Albany instead of the city of New York, or in Milwaukee instead of Chicago.

New Orleans purchases now a considerable percentage of the foreign exchange arising from the exports of cotton from cotton exporters located in Houston and Galveston, and will purchase every dollar of exchange created in the entire territory whenever the facilities arising from the regional bank are at its disposal and its natural connections are not diverted by operation of law to other centers.

It has been said that New Orleans, being at times a rediscounting city, can not facilitate the territory, which statement surely arises from a misconception of conditions, as well as from a misunderstanding of the purposes of the regional bank. If the funds now carried by New Orleans banks in Chicago and New York as reserve were carried at home, New Orleans would never need to borrow a dollar and would have surplus funds to lend. There is never a time when the indebtedness of New Orleans banks to their correspondents is not less than the amounts which they have on deposit with them at the time; and if the reserves of the great States of Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, and Tennessee, or the parts of these States referred to as an alternative territory are kept in a regional bank here, where they belong, not only will this bank be able to care for the requirements of its territory liberally but it will be able to help out other sections in their time of need. In the panic of 1907 no one had nearly the trouble to draw funds from New Orleans as was experienced in some of the other cities. New Orleans exchange at no time went above $2.50 per thousand, while Pittsburgh and St. Louis exchange was sold at $10 per thousand discount. We bought foreign exchange in St. Louis with our balances to get the funds out of that city.

Furthermore, if I correctly understand the proper method of conducting a regional bank, its credit facilities should always be a reserve facility used only when the general credit facility of the country for legitimate commercial purposes has been exhausted. Just in the same manner as the Bank of England maintains a rate of interest slightly in excess of the general private discount rate, in order to force the stock of credit to be taken up first and thus not compete with it, so do I understand the regional bank will see to it that its facilities will be kept in reserve, thereby preventing undue expansion and thereby being certain to have the credit facility when urgently needed. For this reason the great general credit facilities of the country will be just as available to banks as heretofore, and they are adequate in ordinary times; and when inadequate in times of great industry and large crops and periodically at certain seasons of the year during the heavy marketing period the reserve banks will supply the deficiency.

It has also been contended that a bank located in a section of great agricultural importance should be tied to a bank in a different territory, this contention having been made at the St. Louis hearing, and it is much more specious than sound. There is no city of importance in this Union, other than New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, which does not serve an agricultural community to a greater or less degree, nor are there any crops of great volume or importance grown in the United States which do not move practically at the same time. Cotton, corn, wheat, oats, barley, sugar cane, sugar beets, rice, and fruits, constituting 80 per cent of our agricultural production, move in the fall of the year, practically at the same time, and no city properly serving such a community, whether it be St. Louis, Chicago, Minneapolis, or Kansas City, is any more free from strain at that period than is New Orleans; many of them borrow surreptiously abroad or sell out of their portfolio to other cities, in order not to show the same in their bills payable, under the absurd idea that a bank should not employ the idle funds of another section when needed in its own, while New Orleans, to serve its section, openly uses its credit facilities and facilitates the stupendous volume of business which is naturally tributary to it.

The volume of foreign exchange against actual exports of merchandise handled in New Orleans last year aggregated $174,207,400, this exchange being created locally and in Mississippi, Alabama, and Texas, and being against the greatest variety of commodities shipped to almost every country on the globe.

In addition to the foreign exchange above referred to, New Orleans issues commercial letters of credit for the importation of merchandise of approximately $20,000,000 per annum, and which business shows a constant growth from year to year.

The volume of country checks cleared through New Orleans last year, drawn on points in the territory claimed as our legitimate territory, aggregated $478,042,000, and came to us from all of the States in the Union; and, were it not for the "window-dressing" proclivities of some competitive cities, which handle business at a loss in order to swell figures and footings and which New Orleans has never done, it would be ten times the amount, and as soon as the regional banks are established and the unfair embargo upon business imposed by some country banks for the service disappears, the volume handled here will be equal to the entire volume of business in this territory.

The total clearings of New Orleans amounted to over $1,000,000,000 last year, an increase of 100 per cent in the last five years.

In considering these clearings it must be remembered that New Orleans clearings are settled each day in cash and not in cashiers' checks, a custom which prevails in other cities, and which cashiers' checks are again sent through the clearing houses, thus creating a duplication which gives a fictitious amount and creates the impression of a much larger volume of business than is actually conducted.

New Orleans is the only port south of Philadelphia which has any number of regular sailings to foreign ports. Merchandise can be consigned to New Orleans for export to meet regular sailing days, while in nearly all of the other Gulf and South Atlantic ports this business is done by tramp steamers with no regular sailings. The steamship lines sending their ships to this port are shown on this map. To Panama and Central American Republics we have almost daily sailings furnished by three steamship lines having their main offices in New Orleans. The practically water-grade haul for railroads to the South, and the freedom from snow and ice throughout the year, makes it certain that the port of New Orleans is the natural funnel through which the vast quantity of exports and imports of the entire territory between the Allegheny and the Rocky Mountains must find its way to and from foreign markets. New Orleans as a port is America's port and is so desirably located that it should be a national port and should be, and I believe will eventually be, developed by the National Government to enable it to care for economically the stupendous quantities of incoming and outgoing merchandise to and from the rest of the world, for which this city will be the depot. The trend of transportation will henceforth, with the opening of the Panama Canal, be north and south and no longer east and west. It is as inevitable and certain as the law of gravitation. To care for the present a regional bank for this territory must be established here. Its management here will need to be as able in many respects as that of New York; its business will be as complex and its variety equally as great. As to the future, within a decade the regional bank at New Orleans will be second only to that of

New York in size and in importance if we grasp our opportunities and do not allow Germany and England to capture the trade of South America, Central America, Australia, and the Orient.

I have made no mention of the variety of our agriculture and industries and shall only enumerate them here to show the variety thereof, and that a regional bank established here will serve a greater variety of commodities than a regional bank in almost any other city.

The agriculture of the section shown on the map as being served by a regional bank located here is as follows: Cotton, oats, rice, tobacco, wheat, hay, strawberries, vegetables of every kind, corn, sugar cane, citrus fruits.

The mineral production is as follows: Iron, natural gas, building stone, coal, surplur, oil, salt.

The live-stock production is cattle, poultry, hogs, sheep.

The sea products are oysters, shrimp, fresh and salt water fish.

The forest products are pine, gum, cypress, ash, white oak, poplar, and many other hardwood varieties.

The goods manufactured are cotton cloth, yarns, knitted goods, steel rails, wire, pipe and rolling mill products generally, tin and galvanized iron cans, tanks, culverts, stoves, cooperage, sash, doors, and blinds, crossties, furniture, wagons and carts, fertilizers, chemicals, acids, soap, lard compound, cottonseed oil, cottonseed meal and cake, mixed stock and poultry feed, cigars, cigarettes, and smoking tobacco, sauces, pickles, preserves, vinegar, molasses and sirups, jute and cotton bags, alcohol, natural and denatured, boats and boat oars, gasoline, naphtha, lubricating oils, paraffin, rosin, turpentine, and tar, cement, roasted coffee, clothing for men, women, and children, and many more too numerous to mention, but sufficient surely to show that there need be no fear of an inadequate diversification of collateral.

It is, indeed, unfortunate that some of our sister cities can not see the manifold advantages of a great regional bank on the Gulf coast at New Orleans and allow their petty trade jealousies to favor a more remote city, not realizing as they should that every dollar kept near home is as available to them as it would be if the regional bank were located in their own city.

Several gentlemen, experts in their line, will give you a few facts pertinent to the subject, and, when they have been heard, we will leave our case in your hands, in full confidence that neither political influence, petty jealousy, nor ambition will sway your judgment.

THE NEW ORLEANS BOARD OF TRADE (LTD.),
New Orleans, February 3, 1914.

Resolutions adopted by the New Orleans Board of Trade (Ltd.) February 3, 1914.

Whereas the reserve bank organization commission charged by the Government with the locating of Federal reserve banks in the different districts of the country will require conclusive information and data in substantiation of the claims of different cities before locating a reserve bank in their localities; and

Whereas the city of New Orleans is the most populous city in the South, the center of a large agricultural district, having business connections with the whole of the State of Louisiana, of practically the whole State of Mississippi, southern portion of Arkansas, part of Alabama, and southern Texas; and

Whereas in addition to its geographical location to serve this section it is the real financial center, doing a larger banking business than any other city in the southern portion of the country; and

Whereas New Orleans is the greatest American market for cotton, rice, and sugar and is in the center of a large lumber district; and

Whereas New Orleans is the second largest port in the country, both in volume and valuation of imports and exports, with an import business as great as that of all the other south Atlantic and Gulf ports combined; and

Whereas New Orleans is the only distributing point for coffee for the Southern and Mississippi Valley States, ranking second to New York only in the importation of coffee, and first in the importation of tropical fruits; and

Whereas the port of New Orleans has increased its trade with Cuba, Mexico, Porto Rico, and Central America 500 per cent in the past 13 years and there is every indication that with the opening of the Panama Canal a new trade era for New Orleans will be opened up to the west coast of the Latin Americas and increase in a greater ratio than that with the east coast, and that New Orleans will surely be the gateway of the Mississippi Valley to the Latin Americas and the Orient, as the Mississippi River and its great navigable tributaries will again be brought into use for the handling of a large share of commerce of the country: Therefore be it

Resolved, That all of the aforementioned advantages show that the city of New Orleans would exert a preponderating influence in a Federal reserve district such as it would serve, and by establishing a regional bank in this city the New Orleans Board of Trade (Ltd.) is firmly convinced that the commissioners would be fully complying with the intent and purposes of the new currency law.

WHITNEY-CENTRAL NATIONAL BANK,
New Orleans, La., February 28, 1914.

Hon. WILLIAM G. MCADOO,
Chairman Committee on Organization of Regional Banks,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Supplementing the brief filed with you by me, as representing the clearing-house association of the city of New Orleans and the business interests generally, at the hearing before your honorable committee held in this city on February 11 and 12, 1914, in accordance with the permission granted at that time, I take the liberty of submitting to you herewith:

A compilation of statistics showing the total value of commodities distributed during the year 1913 from the city of New Orleans, together with the percentages of distribution to the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, Texas, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, and Tennessee, the value of commodities distributed to all other States in the Union, and the value of commodities exported. From this you will observe that the total value of commodities aggregates $1,128,291,426, embracing 132 specified articles aggregating $1,088,291,426 and miscellaneous articles not enumerated aggregating $40,000,000. Of the aggregate it will be observed that $178,078,569 represent the value of commodities exported, and the percentage of domestic distribution is as follows:

	Per cent.
Louisiana	39.54
Mississippi	14.35
Texas	13.95
Alabama	6.38
Florida	4.77
Tennessee	3.42
Georgia	4.41
All other States	13.18

These figures have been compiled with great care and are as nearly accurate as could possibly be obtained. Three copies of the statement are inclosed for your inspection.

I beg to call your attention to figures recently submitted to me by one of the leading express companies doing, in addition to a merchandise express business, a very large financial business, in which it is shown that the volume of financial transactions done by this company in the city of New Orleans is the third largest of that done in any city in the United States, being exceeded only by New York and Chicago. This company has requested the withholding of its name, otherwise the same would be cheerfully furnished, together with the exact figures in the premises.

It appears to me proper to make at this time some mention of the fact that the port facilities of New Orleans, occupying 14 miles of river front, of which more than 7 miles have been developed, together with a belt line of railroad, are owned, respectively, by the State of Louisiana and the city of New Orleans for the benefit of the whole country, and that access to these facilities is practically free to the commerce of the world, only such charge being levied as is necessary to cover the actual expense of operation and fixed charges.

Since your recent visit $3,000,000 have been appropriated for the purpose of erecting modern cotton warehouses for the storage of cotton, which is certain to attract to New Orleans the storage of a large quantity of this important commodity for distribution throughout the world, in the same manner that it is now handled at the port of Liverpool. The extending of this system of public warehouses, public wharves, and public freight transportation will be made as rapidly as financial conditions and requirements of trade permit.

When it is considered that the high cost of living is to some extent due to the increased consumption of foodstuffs without a proportionate increase in production, and the fact is given due weight that in the territory claimed by New Orleans not exceeding 15 per cent of the arable land is in cultivation, every effort should be made on the part of the Federal Government to attract the greatest possible attention to a territory offering such tremendous facilities for increased production of food products, in which the laborer can live at the minimum of cost, and the establishment of a regional bank in this section will undoubtedly have this very desirable effect and focus in a sense the eyes of the desirable emigrant population of Europe, as well as the land seekers in this country, to the advantages of soil, transportation, and climate which this section affords.

I take the liberty of furthermore calling your attention to the report of the board appointed to inspect and report to the Secretary of the Navy on the general conditions existing at the navy yard at New Orleans, which is dated July 29, 1913, and is addressed to the Hon. B. R. TILLMAN, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and signed by the Hon. Josephus Daniels, Secretary of the Navy. This report was made by Rear Admiral John R. Edwards, United States Navy, president of the board of inspection for shore stations, and is the result of a most careful examination.

In the said report, on page 6, paragraph 26, reference is made to the sanitary condition at New Orleans as being excellent, and to the expenditure of $30,000,000 for drainage, sewerage, and purification of water.

On page 8, article 6, reference is made to the pier facilities, as well as to the fact that no difficulty would be experienced in the construction of wharves with platforms for unloading and loading at any part of the river under the jurisdiction of the dock commission; and in paragraph 36 the statement is made that from a military, as well as from industrial and maritime standpoints, the possession of the river frontage by the dock commission of the port gives New Orleans a remarkable advantage as a shipping and embarkation port, and particularly when there is taken into consideration the number of trunk rail and steamship lines that make this point a terminal.

On page 10, paragraph 43, reference is made to the coal supply and distribution as being an extremely important factor for the commerce and manufacturing of any city, and the definite statement that New Orleans and Philadelphia are the only points on the Atlantic and Gulf where unlimited supplies of both fuel oil and coal could be procured in times of emergency.

On page 12 of the same report reference is made to the depth of water and the ability of vessels of the largest draft to pass through the mouth of the Mississippi River and harbor in front of the city of New Orleans.

The importance of New Orleans as a port is demonstrated by the fact that during the Revolutionary War supplies were transported up the Mississippi River by Gen. Galves to the American forces under Gen. Washington.

The transfer of New Orleans and the Mississippi Valley to the United States by Napoleon is historically stated to have been made in order that England might be prevented from ever increasing her possessions in America. In 1814 the British Government, after mature deliberation, came to the conclusion that New Orleans was strategically, at that time, the most vital point in the United States of America, and that the capture of that city and the control of the great Mississippi River meant the eventual destruction of the Union. It was stated by President Jefferson, in urging the purchase of the Territory of Louisiana, that New Orleans was not only the key to the Gulf, but to the Caribbean and the West Indies. During his administration of office President John Tyler recommended a naval station at New Orleans. During the Mexican War the bulk of the arms for both Gens. Taylor and Scott went through New Orleans, and that city was one of the important distributing supply centers of that war. In 1862 the capture of New Orleans was regarded as a fatal stroke to the Confederacy. This city has, therefore, figured in every large war in which the United States has participated. It was regarded as of inestimable value by Mr. Jefferson when he bought it; by England, who tried to seize it; and by the northern forces, who captured it.

On page 17, paragraph 79, the statement is made that New Orleans is the terminus of six trunk lines of railroads. The communication by water with the vast extent of territory embraced in the valley of the Mississippi is unsurpassed. It is the principal commercial port of the Gulf States and possesses great facilities for obtaining every class of building material, skilled and unskilled labor, and supplies; coal is abundant and cheap. The amount of commerce that passes in and out of the Gulf of Mexico is a very large portion of the total commerce of the United States.

On page 18, paragraph 87, it is stated that the inland transportation facilities are not exceeded by more than a few cities in the United States. Paragraph 90 states that New Orleans is one of the large wholesale markets of the country. As evidence of appreciation of this phase by the Army, it may be stated that the Quartermaster's Department maintains an officer at this port, who acts as purchasing agent for the Quartermaster Corps. The same officer acts for the Isthmian Canal Commission and also for the commissary department of the Panama Railroad.

On page 25, paragraph 125, the statement is made that New Orleans is probably the only port in the world where battleships drawing 30 feet of water could replenish their oil-fuel compartments in a few hours, and that the export of oil from New Orleans during the past fiscal year surpassed even that of Philadelphia.

Much more could be said upon the subject of the importance of New Orleans as a commercial and financial center, but we feel that you are sufficiently conversant with the facts on the subject, and, with the brief previously filed and the additional information furnished herein, the matter is respectfully submitted.

Very truly, yours,

SOL. WEXLER.
Chairman New Orleans Clearing House Committee.

In connection with this I wish to read an editorial published in a very important newspaper in the State of North Carolina—the Charlotte Observer. It reflects the opinion of some of the good people throughout the South. It is as follows:

PUT NEW ORLEANS IN IT.

The outstanding feature of the reserve bank organization committee's announcement of reserve cities is the almost incredibly rough deal given New Orleans. All forecasters, without exception, had taken it for granted that she would receive a reserve bank. New York, New Orleans, Chicago, and San Francisco were the four cities regarded as certainties beyond the slightest possibility of dispute. New Orleans is not only by far the largest city in the South, and over twice the size of any other city in the cotton belt, but she is also the heart center of the cotton belt, both geographically and by business ties. She has the great southern cotton exchange and the great southern port. She is the only southern port city whose imports amount to much. She is at this moment preparing for actual construction upon immense cotton warehouses, designed and financed upon a scale to help revolutionize cotton marketing in the whole South. She has a monopoly of the domestic cane-sugar and molasses trade. Her jobbing trade in the various lines is vast. The most important southern center, she is the metropolis without a rival of the entire south-central South. And as regards her future relation to her territory, it is generally agreed that no other American city will receive such direct and solid benefit from the Panama Canal; nearly all the Mississippi Valley will pour whatever business it does by way of the canal with the Pacific coast, Latin America, or Asia through her. Another matter worthy of much consideration is that no other southern city has one-tenth of her financial and business connections abroad, whether in Europe, South America, or the Orient. In every way she is much the best known and best established abroad; and one avowed object of the reserve system is to increase both the prestige and facilities abroad of American finance.

New Orleans, with all these overwhelming advantages, is tacked on to the extreme southwestern edge of a district based upon the branch mailing office and patent medicine city of Atlanta. She is just off the ragged eastern edge of a district based upon the saddle and harness center of Dallas, Tex. The vast domestic and foreign trade which the southern metropolis does for the South must be financed, therefore, with the maximum of inconvenience—a bad thing, as far as it goes, for southern interests as well as for her. And in the announcement which includes this staggering omission the committee does not even show the grace to explain. New Orleans should be in the list by every single test which they mention as having guided them; yet it might seem they wish to ignore the fact that she exists.

Everyone knew that many wires, both in and out of politics, were pulled for Richmond and Atlanta, the latter's case on its merits being clearly weak. New Orleans did not trouble herself, except in a perfunctory way, because she considered her selection a matter of course. There were rumors in the closing days that Atlanta had the nerve to attempt to edge New Orleans out, but few, if any, outside observers believed this possible, even if Atlanta did get herself inside the list. The incredible has now hapened somehow. Richmond and Atlanta both had powerful friends at work. We of this section are well satisfied to be in a district, arranged as ours is, including Baltimore and Washington and with Richmond as the reserve city. We like to see Atlanta get anything she can consistent with wider interests. But it must be clear to us all that the omission of New Orleans should be remedied at the first opportunity by the Federal Reserve Board.

Now, I will not say that politics entered into the selection of these sites, but it looks very singular. Here I have a map before me, and, as I said before, I believe that the cities were selected first—and it is the only conclusion that I can reach after studying it—and then the dislocations and amputations were made, here and there, in order to fit.

New Orleans, relying upon her position first, with the largest capital and with the prospect of the great business that is bound to flow down the Mississippi River and through the Panama Canal, with her great banking system, felt that she should be selected for a reserve bank.

Now, many reasons have been assigned and figures have been juggled with which I can not understand. I am not a banker and I am very poor at figures, but I have never been able to understand how they figured out that $33,000,000 was larger than $80,000,000.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will my friend from Louisiana yield?

Mr. ESTOPINAL. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that the city of Galveston is the second city in the United States as a point of export for cotton, live stock, and everything else that leaves Texas, Oklahoma, and all the vast West behind Texas, and is it not a fact that Dallas, Tex., is really the financial center of that great trade?

Mr. ESTOPINAL. I admit that. I am not quarreling with Dallas. I am simply citing Dallas as compared with New Orleans. The gentleman says that Galveston has the cotton. Yes; I believe that Galveston has for one or two years exceeded New Orleans as a cotton-exporting port, but it will not last. I can assure the gentleman that after our warehouses are built New Orleans will recover the business that she has lost. I have no quarrel with Dallas. I simply mentioned it in my objection to the carving process, a part of the State being placed with Dallas, which was not the proper thing to do. But the large city of New Orleans is placed with Atlanta, and so our quarrel seems to be with Atlanta.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think you are right about that.

Mr. ESTOPINAL. Mr. Chairman, these resolutions that are sent up here from New Orleans have been characterized here in many ways. We did not prepare the resolutions, but our people down there did. They were indignant. The resolutions represent the indignant outburst of an outraged community. We were bid to resent the action of the committee to this Congress, and show that the American people must know something about the methods that were used in reaching the distribution of these banks. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, it is very gratifying indeed to me that no serious criticism of the action of the Federal reserve organization committee in selecting Dallas is offered. There have been statements made to-day, however, by some of the gentlemen representing cities which are complaining at not having been chosen, which does not give credit to the financial and commercial importance of Dallas, the seat of the proposed bank, nor to the State of Texas, which constitutes a large part of that district.

I understand full well that in a great Nation like this, with many large and progressive cities, each one ambitious to be selected as the seat of one of these banks, disappointment of the keenest sort is inevitable. This disappointment has been reflected upon the floor here to-day, and incidentally—I am glad to say only incidentally—the selection of Dallas has been criticized.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to say in support of the committee's action in having located a bank in Texas that there are only seven States, namely, New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Massachusetts, Ohio, California, and Texas, which have a bank capital and surplus sufficient to organize a regional reserve bank. From the beginning of the investigation by the locating committee it has been conceded that a regional reserve bank would in all probability be located in each of the six first-mentioned States. Such location has been recommended, and, in so far as we have heard, without criticism. The fact that it was not conceded from the beginning that one of these banks would also be located in Texas, the other State able with its own resources to organize a regional reserve bank, was due to no other cause than the lack of general information with regard to the resources of that State.

The criticism to-day which involves indirectly the Dallas location would not have been made had gentlemen been advised as to the resources. Certainly the vast extent and the geographical location of Texas in the extreme southwestern section of this country, most of it far removed from any large city without the State, made it necessary to locate one of the banks within the State, if a district of sufficient strength could be organized in that section.

The country does not appreciate what Texas really is. It is fifth in population among the States of the Nation; it is second among the States in number of banks. It is true that some of them are small, but they are growing. These locations are to be made not for to-day only, but for the years to come. The growth during the past 10 years gives some idea of what may be expected.

On November 17, 1903, Texas had 377 national banks, with a capital and surplus of $37,300,000 and individual deposits of $88,000,000. On October 21, 1913, it had 519 national banks, with a capital and surplus of $76,000,000 and individual deposits of $203,066,000. There were no State banks at the time first mentioned, but on October 21, 1913, there were 832 State banks, with capital and surplus of $38,992,000 and individual deposits of $93,000,000, an increase of 974 banks, $78,065,000 capital and surplus, and $208,166,000 in individual deposits. The bank capitalization of Texas increased, therefore, in 10 years over 300 per cent, and the individual deposits increased during that time 350 per cent.

For the purpose of making clear the relative strength of Texas, I beg to call attention to the fact that Louisiana has $13,500,000 capital and surplus, the rich State of Missouri $51,000,000, while, as stated, Texas has $76,000,000. The loans and discounts of Texas banks are greater than those of Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Florida combined.

This district under ordinary conditions will always be self-sufficient, but in the event of necessity to borrow from the Federal Reserve Board the district can always count upon the receipts from its cotton, which will average around 6,000,000 bales per annum and above $350,000,000 in value.

Incidentally, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to the fact that of this production some 5,000,000 bales is exported, whereas of the cotton produced outside of the Dallas district only about 2,000,000 bales are exported, the remainder being held for home consumption, and this becomes a burden upon the banking power of the country.

I have spoken only of the cotton production of the district, but in estimating the strength of Texas it should be borne in mind that in addition to its lumbering, mining (including oil), and its manufacturing interests, which in the aggregate are large, it is the chief agricultural State of the Nation. With its large exportations the necessity of having facilities for handling foreign bills of exchange is apparent.

Mr. Chairman, a great part of this discussion has been centered about the rival cities and their respective banking facilities. This is a matter of minor importance. These regional reserve banks are not to be dependent upon the cities in which they are located, but are to be supported by the banks of the district in which they are located.

But, Mr. Chairman, the city in which the committee has located the bank of the eleventh district compares as favorably with any of its rivals as Texas as a whole compares with the other States or the Dallas district with any other district.

To-day Dallas has a population of over 120,000 inhabitants. In 1910 its population was 92,105. In 1900 its population was 42,000.

Dallas is in the heart of the agricultural section of the Southwest and is itself the manufacturing and commercial center of a large territory. Within a radius of 100 miles of Dallas is only 10.8 per cent of the territory of Texas, but 1,399,082 people are included therein, owning property assessed at $747,666,886. Dallas is first in the manufacturing of cotton gins and of harness and saddlery. It is second to one only in the distribution of farm machinery. The sales of the 318 wholesale houses last year were $211,458,000, and its factory output was $42,595,000. Dallas has 160 concerns rated over $1,000,000. Two thousand two hundred traveling men have their headquarters at Dallas. Another evidence of the activities and importance of Dallas is its postal receipts. Last year they were $1,002,000. The building permits last year were $8,439,540.

In 1904 the national banks of Dallas had a capital and surplus of $2,676,000, with individual deposits of $7,157,000. In 1914 this capital and surplus had reached $5,900,000 and individual deposits $18,551,000. In this same period State banks have been established which brought the total bank capital and surplus up to $9,997,000 and deposits up to $24,808,891.

But, Mr. Chairman, the strongest proof of the wisdom of the choice of the committee in selecting Dallas and in arranging the boundaries of the eleventh district is the unanimity with which the banks of the district accept the arrangement. These are the banks most interested, as they must subscribe to the stock of the reserve bank and must look to it for their banking service.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to be designated "from Nebraska." I did not know but that I would be designated "the gentleman from that remote financial province so illogically and inconveniently attached under the new currency act to the regional bank located at the confluence of the Big Muddy and the Raging Kaw."

Discussion having been injected into this debate criticizing the districts numbered 5, 6, and 11, referred to now as Richmond, Atlanta, and Dallas districts, I do not desire by my silence to let it be understood that the northern half of district No. 10 is satisfied or willing to condone the imposition placed upon it. This objection is not confined to disappointed candidate cities for the location of the regional banks. The public is interested. If the objection were not so apparent, we might think the rest of the country might not know of the humiliation, and we could suffer in silence. But the injustice is so obvious that the map reveals it at once. Those acquainted with the course of business and the distribution of population will see emphasis added to the map.

The law regulating these districts is as follows:

As soon as practicable the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Comptroller of the Currency, acting as "the reserve bank organization committee," shall designate not less than 8 nor more than 12 cities, to be known as Federal reserve cities, and shall divide the continental United States, excluding Alaska, into districts, each district to contain only one of such Federal reserve cities. The determination of said organization committee shall not be subject to review except by the Federal Reserve Board when organized: Provided, That the districts shall be apportioned with due regard to the convenience and customary course of business and shall not necessarily be coterminous with any State or States.

Look at district No. 10. The largest of the 12 districts in area save one, that one the Pacific coast district. District No. 10 contains 446,658 square miles. One-sixth of the area of the United States. Twice the area of the average district formed by the board. This area is made up as follows:

	Miles.
Wyoming	97,890
Colorado	103,925
Nebraska	77,510
Kansas	82,080
New Mexico (part)	41,470
Oklahoma (part)	33,262
Missouri (part)	10,521

If a line were drawn through Kansas City north and south, there would be to the east within said district not more than 7,425 square miles, while to the west there would be 433,233 square miles, or 1.6 per cent to the east and 98.4 per cent to the west. Draw a line through Kansas City from the east to the west line of the tenth district, and three-fifths of the district would be to the northwest and two-fifths to the southwest. In that part of the district to the east of Kansas City the population would be not more than 9 per cent, while to the west would be 91 per cent. In that part north of the line running west through Kansas City there are about two-thirds of the population of the district and at least as great a proportion of the business—banking, manufacturing, commercial, and otherwise. In this northern section a large proportion of its carrying trade is over four great lines of railway, namely, Chicago & Northwestern, Union Pacific, Burlington, and Rock Island, none of whose main lines run through Kansas City. From the northwestern corner of Wyoming to Kansas City is more than 1,000 miles, and no direct or immediate railway connections. The railways doing the carrying for this part of the great district, some of them run through each of the capitals—Cheyenne, Denver, and Lincoln—while all of them run to or through Omaha. From nearly all this northern territory Kansas City is reached by branch or side lines.

That Kansas City is not the logical point for this northern territory is confessed, first:

The Treasury Department classifies Missouri as a southern State, presumably with reference to its financial operations. The northern part of district 10 is classified as northern for the same reason. Kansas City's lack of right to this northern territory is confessed on the map when taken in connection with the law, which says that the district shall be apportioned "with due regard to the convenience and customary course of business." But one row of counties are taken from the western edge of Missouri, just enough to include Kansas City. Will Kansas City have nerve to retain the regional bank under this arrangement, which shows that in her commercial battling with St. Louis, St. Louis covered and controlled 96 counties, while Kansas City controlled only 19 counties in their own State? The conclusion is obvious. St. Louis was to be saved, while Kansas City was to be forced upon the public.

We would not object to Kansas City being the center of a district of western Missouri, Kansas, Oklahoma, Texas, and New Mexico. We do not dislike Kansas City as a city, nor Missouri as a State, but it is not a question of our likes and dislikes; it is a question of our rights under a law which, from its beginning, was charged with partisanship, on the one hand, and declared by its friends to be nonpartisan. We are entitled to such a small measure of fairness as the ultrapartisanship of the law would permit. This districting was certainly partisan on the face of it. Its friends should be well satisfied that so mild a term as partisanship would be the charge. The following editorial from the Lincoln (Nebr.) State Journal is a true one:

It makes a formidable prima facie case against the regional bank organization committee to show that the three committeemen landed four regional banks in their own States. This is made the stronger by the surprise that Richmond should score as against Baltimore—Richmond, which is the home of Comptroller Williams, a member of the committee. Of course, Secretary McAdoo's home city, New York, was to have a bank, regardless of pull. So was St. Louis, the home of Secretary Houston. The case of Kansas City, also in Secretary Houston's State, was not so clear, however. There was no hope to distribute the banks so as to escape criticism from the cities that got none. But the distribution in these two respects subjects the committee to suspicions that will never down, however strong a case is made for the merits of their distribution of the banks.

Of course, we expect to some extent that Missouri, with its commanding political influence, would, in political matters, have an effective influence in the interests of the State and its cities, but I trust that Missouri will do the rest of district No. 10 the credit of knowing when we are slugged and by whom. We may also be credited with remembering the history of the currency bill through its pendency; the opposition from certain quarters, which was fierce and which suddenly changed into warm support. The assailing hawk became suddenly the mild-mannered crow protecting his carrion. We have the highest consideration for the Secretary of Agriculture, against whom we join with no man in the charge that he neglects or forgets his friends. We know the influence and power of the brilliant Missouri delegation on this floor. We recognize the influence and ability of our great Speaker, whose splendid Americanism has appealed so strongly to the country. We recollect also Missouri has a Senator whom even Presidents visit. With these in mind, we expect Missouri primacy. But when Missouri, the seventh State in population, seventh in banking capital and surplus, eighth in wealth, and eighteenth in area, is given two regional banks and one of them has such a precarious footing within the State of Missouri that an angry rise of the Missouri or a flood of the Kaw might wash the regional bank over into the St. Louis district, we are forced to say that Missouri deals Missouri a mighty liberal brand of justice. Especially will this appear when we note that the great Empire State, with three times Missouri's wealth and three times its population, with great cities—New York and Buffalo—five times as large as as combined St. Louis and Kansas City, has but one. There is in the Keystone State, with two times the population and one and one-half times the wealth of Missouri, with two great cities—Philadelphia and Pittsburgh—353 miles apart and collectively being twice as large as St. Louis and Kansas City, only one regional bank. Further, Ohio, with two great cities—Cincinnati and Cleveland—practically the same distance from each other that Kansas City and St. Louis are; a State having much greater population and wealth than Missouri, has but one regional bank. All these great cities must note the passing of empire on to Missouri.

Mr. Chairman, I sought to obtain some definite information as to the peculiar location and arrangement of district No. 10. I challenge the attention of the House to the map. There are 12 districts. Certain of them are seaboard districts, and in certain cases the regional banks are located upon the seaboard, presumably with the idea that the commerce of the sea will supplement and become, in effect, a part of the business of the regional bank of the district. But a number of the districts are purely inland. Calling attention to the Richmond district, it is not purely inland or purely seaboard, but Richmond is located geographically somewhere near the center of the district, and in population somewhere near the center. The same is true of Atlanta, Dallas, Minneapolis, Chicago, St. Louis, and Philadelphia. Geography is consulted in each of these cases. In each case, except the tenth, there seems to have been an attempt to locate the bank at a point somewhere near the resultant of the following forces: Area, population, transportation, banking power, business, wealth, and bank preference. But in district No. 10, which is the largest in area of the inland districts and the second district of all, where geography, perhaps, ought to control more than any other consideration, the regional bank is placed in the extreme margin of the district. I sought information from the gentleman [Mr. GLASS] who, on the floor of the House, defended the reserve board, as to why this was done. I did not obtain from him what seemed to me a satisfactory answer. I agree that the circumstances point very strongly to a confirmation of the statement of the gentleman from Louisiana, Gen. ESTOPINAL, who said that the regional-bank cities were located first and the districts afterwards. I did not believe that there had been a plebiscite or a referendum of the banks of district No. 10 submitted after the Federal reserve district had been established, because to me it seems absolutely inconceivable that district No. 10 was located in the way it now is and that there should be any division of sentiment in the north half of the district in registering their votes against Kansas City.

A study of the tables submitted by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] shows preference of national banks for Omaha to have been: Nebraska, 181; Iowa, 17; Wyoming, 10; South Dakota, 8; Idaho, 2. Yet the gentleman from Virginia said that Omaha received but 10 votes outside of Nebraska. That seemed to carry the implication that choices were expressed after district No. 10 was determined. To ascertain this fact I wired Hon. Henry W. Yates, of Omaha, Nebr., a banker of national reputation, asking him if the bankers of Nebraska had been given an opportunity to express a preference after the district boundaries were determined. I received the following answer:

OMAHA, NEBR., April 8, 1914.

Hon. CHAS. H. SLOAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

No opportunity whatever was given the banks to express preference concerning either boundaries or reserve cities after the districts were fixed, when Nebraska was tied up with a slice of western Missouri, Kansas, Oklahoma, and a slice of Texas. Omaha could not expect to be named as reserve city; it was fixed for Kansas City alone. The outrage lies in putting us into such a district, with which we have little in common, and where a higher interest rate has prevailed and the business methods pursued are entirely different. About seven millions of Nebraska money must be placed in that bank, whether used by Nebraska people or not.

HENRY W. YATES.

In the first place, district No. 10 is a distinct violation of the first principle for the establishment of the districts. There is a distinct difference between the northern half of district No. 10 and the southern half. That difference is recognized by the Treasury Department of the United States, Missouri having been classified by the United States Treasury as a southern State. When I say that, I do not mean in a historical sense, but in the sense of its business course, the course of its mail, and the course of its banking business, while Omaha, Colorado, and Wyoming are distinctively northern.

Now, the Secretary of the Treasury, using his own classification, would seem to me to be compelled to make a district that would include those States last mentioned in a northern district. Taking Kansas City, the defender of the system is placed in a very remarkable attitude when he tells the House the reason why Kansas City was selected and Omaha not selected. He stated that it was located at Kansas City because Kansas City had 300 or more votes from outside of Missouri, while Omaha had only 10.

Gentlemen of the House, with Kansas City located on the Missouri River, just one row of counties from Missouri are included in that district; and if they did not include the votes from outside of Missouri, Kansas City could not have made any show at all. Omaha is in the eastern part of Nebraska, with all the territory tributary to her, including all of Nebraska, a large part of Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, and South Dakota, which would be entitled to be considered just the same as those votes granted to Kansas City outside the State of Missouri.

It certainly was not fixed on the basis of transportation, because the four great railway lines, the Chicago & North Western, the Union Pacific, the Burlington, and the Rock Island systems—the four great systems that do the carrying for the district in which are Nebraska and other Northwestern States—none of them have their great main lines running through Kansas City. And when I speak of Kansas City I do not in any way disparage it. It is a splendid city and it has great transportation facilities, but they are not with the Northwest, they are with the Southwest.

The following is the Omaha committee's statement of Omaha's railway and mail service:

"A."

RAILROADS AND MAIL SERVICE.

We would direct your attention especially to the map we submit of the railroads running into Omaha.

It will be seen that every line west converges to Omaha, and the same is very nearly the case in Iowa.

The inconvenience that would exist for bankers west of Omaha, should they be obliged to go to a junction point and wait for a train going west, is too plain to require further reference.

Omaha is the direct line of transcontinental travel between New York, Chicago, San Francisco, Los Angeles, Portland, and Seattle. Denver is off the line of transcontinental travel.

Of the total transcontinental passenger traffic it is estimated that fully 49 per cent passes through Omaha, the remainder being divided between St. Paul and Kansas City.

There are 10 trunk lines with Omaha as a terminal, these trunk lines operating 20 separate and distinct lines, each tapping a separate territory and each territory having a distinct mail service.

The number of trains in and out of Omaha daily is 171, divided as follows:

Chicago, Burlington & Quincy: 6 daily between Omaha and Denver, 4 daily between Omaha and Billings, 2 daily between Omaha and Sioux City, 7 daily between Omaha and Chicago, 6 daily between Omaha and points south, 2 daily between Omaha and St. Louis, 18 daily local. Total, 45 trains.

Chicago & North Western: 8 daily between Omaha and Sioux City, 16 daily between Omaha and Chicago, 2 daily between Omaha and Black Hills, 18 daily local. Total, 44 trains.

Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul: 6 daily between Omaha and Chicago, 4 daily between Omaha and South Dakota points. Total, 10 trains.

Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific: 12 daily between Omaha and Chicago, 6 daily between Omaha and Colorado points. Total, 18 trains.

Union Pacific: 26 daily trains.
Illinois Central: 4 daily between Omaha and Chicago.
Chicago Great Western: 2 daily between Omaha and Chicago, 4 daily between Omaha and points north. Total, 6 trains.
Missouri Pacific: 8 daily between Omaha and points south.
Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha: 6 daily to the north.
Wabash: 4 daily between Omaha and St. Louis.

The connection of Kansas City with the great northwestern country is largely by branch lines and side lines. The fact that I urge against this arrangement is that it is unnatural and unusual. Men say it is not political. I think when we say it is political, the friends of it ought to realize that we are speaking as mildly as would be warranted. The friends of the favored cities should be satisfied that harsher terms were not used. The gentleman who defended the selection said that Kansas City had infinitely stronger banking power than Omaha. That is not the case. It has a larger banking power than Omaha, but not stronger. The banks of Omaha are and have been for two decades as firm financially as old Gibraltar. So strong a statement can not be made of the banks of Kansas City.

Again, it has been demonstrated by this afternoon's debate that the size of cities, or their banking power, shall not control in fixing the location of the regional banks. If that were true, my friend from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ] would have a regional bank at New Orleans. If that were true, my friend from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] would have a regional bank at Baltimore.

Again, it is not fixed on the basis of preference of the banks as established by this debate, because if it were Pittsburgh and not Cleveland would have had a regional bank. It is not by geographical location; it is not by transportation lines; it is not by banking power.

I notice that Richmond was defended, because while it was not stronger now than Baltimore, but because of the prospect of increase, based upon the increase during the last 10 years. Baltimore's increase was less in percentage than was that of Richmond, and the same defense was submitted for Dallas and for Atlanta.

If that rule were applied to district No. 10, you would never have located this bank at Kansas City. Of the four cities considered, Denver showed the least increase in the last 10 years, Kansas City showed the next lowest—only 74 per cent—while Omaha showed an increase in banking power of 89 per cent. and Lincoln 97 per cent. So, by the system of exclusion and elimination, considering every basis that has been submitted here, I challenge any man to give a substantial reason why district No. 10 was organized as it was, and why a regional bank was placed where it is, unless you be frank about it, gentlemen, and say that you did it because you could. You had, of course, a great political power, and you used it. Why not be frank about it? You have a brilliant line of membership on the floor of this House, capable of getting things, and, I am afraid, capable of keeping them.

It may have just happened, but I would like for somebody to give and to defend on the floor of the House a reason for the selection in Missouri of two regional banks.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that Kansas City is partly in Missouri and partly in Kansas, and that Kansas is a Western State in district No. 10?

Mr. SLOAN. Kansas City, Mo., and Kansas City, Kans., are two distinct municipalities, as the gentleman from Texas knows. I told the gentleman how the Treasurer of the United States classifies Missouri—he classifies it as a Southern State.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that nearly all of the banks and business interests of Kansas have favored Kansas City?

Mr. SLOAN. I am not speaking for Kansas; I am speaking for that natural division lying to the north—Nebraska, Wyoming, Montana, South Dakota, and the western part of Iowa—which was the district that was discussed in Nebraska during the time that the committee was out there. So far as I was concerned, I never heard that there was any prospect of dropping down and making a district No. 10, such as is now constituted.

Mr. GLASS. Let me say to the gentleman that no part of that district voted for Omaha outside of Nebraska.

Mr. SLOAN. I do not know whether they did or not.

Mr. GLASS. I gave you the figures. Only 22 outside of Colorado voted for Denver. Now, continuing the line of the gentleman's statement, we have a great Secretary of State from Nebraska, and if there had been any disposition to play politics the organization committee might have yielded to the Secretary of State.

Mr. SLOAN. Yes; I acknowledge—aye, I boast—of having a great Secretary of State from the State of Nebraska. It does me good to mention that fact. I am proud of him, not only as Secretary of State but as a great diplomat, and one of the greatest strokes of diplomacy that I have noticed recently is the fact that he stayed out of the New Jersey campaign.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is not the gentleman aware of the fact that Kansas City is the greatest live-stock market not only in the United States but in the world; that the States of Kansas, New Mexico, Arizona, and Texas, that raise nearly all of the beef of the United States, must pass their stock through Kansas City; and that they are slaughtered either in Kansas City or in Chicago, and that for that reason the banking business of Kansas City controls the great live-stock business of that portion of the United States?

Mr. SLOAN. It does of that southern country, but it does not of the Northwest. If the gentleman will examine the statistics, he will find the Omaha market has increased in the last 10 years much more rapidly than Kansas City. Kansas City is not the first market. Chicago is the greatest live-stock market in the United States and in the world.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. But the gentleman is aware of the fact that the trains carrying this live stock from the ranges in the West, where the stock is raised, going to Chicago, must pass through Kansas City?

Mr. SLOAN. From the Southwest, but not from the Northwest; and, as I stated, we are not finding any fault with Kansas City having something to do with the great Southwest. The trouble is that it has nothing to do with our section of the country. I shall here place in the RECORD a statement of Omaha's business, as certified to the locating committee by the Omaha committee:

INFORMATION SUPPLEMENTING BRIEF OF BANKS OF OMAHA AND SOUTH OMAHA ON BEHALF OF THE DESIGNATION OF OMAHA FOR A FEDERAL RESERVE BANK.

To the Hon. WILLIAM G. MCADOO,
Secretary of the Treasury.
To the Hon. DAVID F. HOUSTON,
Secretary of Agriculture.
To the Hon. JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS,
Comptroller of the Currency.

GENTLEMEN: Pursuant to your request to file additional data in behalf of Omaha's claims for the location of a Federal reserve bank in Omaha, as outlined at the Lincoln, Nebr., hearing January 24, 1914, the bankers of Omaha and South Omaha respectfully submit the following facts substantiating facts developed at the hearing:

OMAHA IS THE THIRD LARGEST LIVE-STOCK MARKET AND PACKING CENTER.

Figures compiled by the stock yards companies of Kansas City, Omaha, and Chicago show these receipts for 1913:

	Total number head.
Chicago	16,362,192
Kansas City	6,981,418
Omaha	6,758,525
St. Louis	4,633,690

OMAHA IS THE SECOND LARGEST IN RECEIPTS OF SHEEP.

	Total number head.
Chicago	5,902,798
Omaha	3,222,133
Kansas City	2,094,748
St. Louis	949,802

OMAHA IS THE FOURTH LARGEST IN RECEIPTS OF CATTLE.

	Total number head.
Chicago	2,888,456
Kansas City	2,318,885
St. Louis	1,099,997
Omaha	962,103

OMAHA IS THE FOURTH LARGEST IN RECEIPTS OF HOGS.

In total receipts Omaha, Kansas City, and St. Louis are so nearly equal that only 41,000 difference maintains between highest and lowest:

	Total number head.
Chicago	7,570,938
St. Louis	2,583,911
Kansas City	2,567,785
Omaha	2,542,709

OMAHA IS THE LARGEST FEEDER MARKET.

Omaha is the greatest market in the United States for feeder sheep. The shipments of feeder sheep from Omaha during 1913 were 1,468,819 head. Chicago was second, with shipments of 1,449,692, and Kansas City third, with 496,430.

OMAHA IS THE FOURTH PRIMARY GRAIN MARKET.

Figures compiled by the grain exchanges of Chicago, St. Louis, Kansas City, Omaha, and Minneapolis show Omaha fourth in rank, with Kansas City fifth:

	Total receipts.
Chicago (figures not available; easily first)
Minneapolis	185,248,290
St. Louis	80,498,685
Omaha	68,574,700
Kansas City	66,795,200

OMAHA IS THE SECOND PRIMARY CORN MARKET.

Grain-exchange figures show Omaha to be the second primary corn market of the United States, ranking next to Chicago. St. Louis is third and Kansas City fourth:

	Receipts, 1913.
Chicago (figures not available)
Omaha	31,111,200
St. Louis	22,189,045
Kansas City	21,928,000
Minneapolis	8,189,080

OMAHA IS THE FOURTH PRIMARY OAT MARKET.

Omaha is the fourth primary market for oats, with Kansas City fifth:

	Receipts, 1913.
Chicago (figures not available)
Minneapolis	24,560,020
St. Louis	24,363,800
Omaha	16,384,200
Kansas City	10,174,500

OMAHA'S MANUFACTURING AND JOBBING.

The annual manufacturing and jobbing business of Omaha totals $355,012,310; divided, manufacturing $193,385,671 and jobbing $161,626,639. From analysis of shipments, these goods are sent into Nebraska, Iowa, Montana, Colorado, Utah, southern South Dakota, and northern Kansas.

These figures were compiled by the bureau of publicity, Commercial Club of Omaha, and are the compilation of returns made by 389 jobbers and 402 manufacturers. Similar statistics are compiled each year.

A further analysis of these figures shows that Omaha occupies the following position in these respects:

OMAHA IS THE GREATEST CREAMERY-BUTTER PRODUCING CITY IN THE UNITED STATES.

Last year creamery butter of the value of $7,195,452 was shipped out of Omaha. The total number of pounds as reported by the creameries exceeded 25,000,000.

OMAHA IS THE SECOND DISTRIBUTING POINT FOR AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS.

Twenty-four concerns in Omaha reported an aggregate of $15,224,000 worth of implements distributed through the Omaha houses. Kansas City, supplemented by sales from Denver, aggregated about $17,500,000, according to their reports.

OMAHA IS THIRD IN THE VALUE OF PACKING-HOUSE PRODUCTS.

The output of the packing houses of South Omaha totaled $105,819,382 in 1913.

OMAHA'S GROWTH IN 11 YEARS.

Omaha's growth in the past 11 years is an indication of the development of the city and its tributary trade territory. Without exception Omaha has shown remarkable growth, varying from 23 to 329 per cent. Following are the figures:

	1903	1913	Per cent increase.
Population	109,921	155,312	40
Bank clearings	$392,880,920	$908,947,578	170
Bank deposits	$25,612,275	$61,184,070	139
Factory output	$130,583,090	$193,385,671	47
Jobbing	$70,998,467	$161,626,639	122
Live-stock receipts	$5,218,836	$6,758,525	24
Grain receipts		$68,574,700
Post-office receipts	$509,450	$1,325,256	160
Number building permits	329	1,236	272
Value	$962,602	$4,110,773	329
Realty transfers	$7,004,078	$9,371,301	33
Assessable property	$105,856,575	$181,566,890	71

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTON. Would not the gentleman also suggest that the State of Kansas and that western territory could have been served through the regional bank already established at St. Louis?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes. One bank either at St. Louis or Kansas City would have been a fair distribution, because Missouri, as I have stated, is seventh in population, seventh in banking capital and surplus, about eighth in wealth, and eighteenth in area, and in number of national banks is seventeenth in the Union.

The following table shows the leading States with their respective number of national banks expressing a preference for regional-bank location and number of regional banks accorded them:

State.	Number national banks.	Regional banks.
Pennsylvania	764	1
New York	478	1
Texas	438	1
Illinois	419	1
Ohio	343	1
Iowa	303
Oklahoma	283
Minnesota	259	1
California	235	1
Indiana	234
Nebraska	223
Kansas	198
New Jersey	188
Massachusetts	154	1
North Dakota	125
Virginia	118	1
Missouri	116	2
Georgia	108	1

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I understood from the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] that the regional bank was located at Kansas City because the banks of Kansas asked for it.

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I wondered if the banks of New Jersey asked to be attached to Philadelphia instead of New York?

Mr. SLOAN. As I said, I do not think that that made any difference, because a number of instances have been stated where the requests of banks have not controlled. I have cited instances here where the size of the cities did not control. I am talking about a case where the lines of transportation and the course of business did not control. I have cited instances where the area does not control, instances where population did not control, where banking preferences did not control. I do not know a single basis or rule that controlled in one case which has controlled in another. The gentleman will pardon us if we mildly say that politics must have had something to do with it. But we are told by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] that there may have been favoritism shown. That is worse than politics, because politics carries with it party responsibility, while favoritism never appears twice in the same way and no responsibility attaches.

Mr. FESS. Is it not true that those who feared this regional banking system feared it on the basis of partisan politics?

Mr. SLOAN. That was one of the dangers that was pointed out in this body and in the body at the other end of the Capitol. It was pointed out throughout the country. We were assured by those on the other side of the Chamber that politics or favoritism would never have any opportunity to control any of the workings of this system. It is to be deeply deplored that the first concrete movement in the new currency system, by the testimony of men on both sides of this Chamber, and defended by but few, is distinctly political favoritism. This advantage was taken, gentlemen, because you had the power to take it. It is simply the old rule that was announced by Rob Roy in the Highlands of Scotland centuries ago and later enunciated and enforced by Jesse James and Cole Younger in the jungles of Missouri—"that old and simple plan, that he may take who hath the power; that he may keep who can." [Applause.]

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I am certainly pleased that the gentleman from Omaha is so well pleased with himself.

Mr. SLOAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOOHER. No.

Mr. SLOAN. I am not from Omaha.

Mr. BOOHER. It is always a pleasure to see one's friends so greatly gratified with themselves, and to know that they are willing to impute improper motives to everybody else, because it satisfies the hearers that they would never make a mistake or act from improper motives upon any subject.

Now, these men who established these banks are men of very high character, of very high character indeed. They are known to the business world and to the commercial world as men of standing. Their motives are impugned from that side of the Chamber for political reasons, and from this side, God only knows what the reason is, I do not. Now, my friend from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] is terribly worried because there is a bank at Kansas City, and he wants to know why it is. Why, there are many good reasons for it. One, not the principal one, however, is that Kansas City is in one of the greatest States in this Union. It is one of the greatest cities of this Union, it is the most rapidly growing and developing city in the Union, and the people of the State of Missouri were entitled to two banks. And the people of Missouri were entitled to two banks because they had the business; they had the energy and enterprise, and knew how to go after it, and got it. Why did not you learn how? Why should Kansas City have a regional bank? It is the gateway of the Southwest, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] said. It handles the cattle and all the live stock of the Southwest—Oklahoma, Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, Kansas, and Nebraska—it all has to go through Kansas City to get to the market and the most of the slaughtering is done in Kansas City.

I think the people of this country will be interested to learn Kansas City is on a branch-line railroad when it is one of the greatest railroad centers in the West, the greatest railroad center outside of the city of Chicago. My genial friend has said it is on a branch line and that Omaha is on the main line. Why, they could not get by Omaha with the Burlington, so they had to go by there. If it could have gone to any other place in the world, they would have missed Omaha. They never would have gone to Omaha for business, because it is not there. Kansas City, Kans., and Kansas City, Mo., are just one town. The people generally think it is divided by the Kansas River, but that is not so. The two cities are divided by a street. One city, Kansas City, Kans., has 100,000 people, and the city of Kansas City, Mo., has 350,000 people, together making almost 500,000 people in those two communities. It is the second largest live-stock market in the world. They handle more live stock from Montana, Wyoming, Idaho, and Utah than any other city in the West. The greater share of the sheep trade of the Northwest finds its way there. Kansas City is the seventh city in bank clearances in this country, the seventh city in bank clearances for a year. It is one of the few cities that has increased its bank clearances in the last year. Only a few cities showed an increase.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I want to correct some figures with figures which I have here. The gentleman spoke of sheep. In 1913 Chicago handled 5,902,798 sheep, Omaha handled 3,222,135, Kansas City handled 2,394,745, so Omaha handled about 58 per cent more than Kansas City did in 1913.

Mr. BOOHER. I would like to ask the gentleman where he got his figures and who made them?

Mr. SLOAN. Those are figures that are published by the live-stock exchanges of Kansas City, Mo., Chicago, and St. Joseph, the gentleman's town.

Mr. BOOHER. In other words, I will tell the gentleman that he has got some figures showing the amount of stock received each day or for a week or a month at those places, but he has done his own figuring. Now let me say to this committee that no man can convince me that there is any stock market in this country, outside of Chicago, that receives as much live stock of any kind as they receive in Kansas City in a year. It is absolutely impossible——

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I understood the gentleman to say the population of Kansas City, Kans., was 121,000——

Mr. BOOHER. I said 130,000.

Mr. FESS. The census for 1910 shows a population of 82,000, a 50 per cent increase.

Mr. BOOHER. I made the statement in round numbers——

Mr. FESS. It is 84,000.

Mr. BOOHER. I made the statement that there are nearly 500,000 people in those two places, taking in the territory surrounding it.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman estimated 500,000; it is 248,000.

Mr. BOOHER. Wait a moment. Now, let me make this speech, and then my friend from Ohio can make his.

Then there is St. Joseph, with nearly 100,000 people; Leavenworth, with 30,000, and Atchison, Kans., with about 25,000, and all right in the same territory, within 60 miles of Kansas City. All of those cities and all of those communities are to be accommodated, and with all that interest there it is absolutely impossible to escape putting a bank at Kansas City, and I do not presume there is anybody in this House who will question the motives of these men in establishing a bank at St. Louis. The business of the country demanded a bank should go there; and the business of the country likewise demanded that a bank should be in Chicago, and Chicago got it. All of these communities could not get them. I am surprised at some gentlemen who talk upon this proposition in this House. I am looking some gentlemen in the face who did not want but 6 regional banks put into that bill, others did not want but 4, and some did not want but 1, and yet when the bill came in here and reported 12 it was objected that that number was too large. Now, if we had not had 12 there would have been more sore spots than there are now; there would have been more fault-finding with it and more accusation of men who are charged with a great duty, as now, with playing politics with it, without one single bit of evidence to justify the charge. It is all wrong for Members on the floor of this House to make these charges of misconduct against another department of the Government without the shadow of evidence to support the charge.

Now, I was before the board with representatives of Kansas City. There was not one word of politics mentioned. We were simply asked to prepare our figures and show the commercial needs of Kansas City and the country it would represent and that would be tributary to it. That is all we talked about.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESS. Do you sincerely believe that there is absolutely no favoritism whatever in any part of this division?

Mr. BOOHER. Now, the gentleman uses the word "favoritism" instead of "politics," and I am glad he does. There is a great deal of difference in the two. I want to say to my friend that if I lived in a city in his State, in the city of Cincinnati or in the city of Cleveland, for instance, and happened to be a member of that board, if I honestly believed that my city was entitled to a bank I would have stood by my city, and I think the gentleman would have done the same thing. Now, that is the way I put that part of it up. There may have been some favoritism. I do not know. I do not believe there was any undue favoritism practiced by any gentleman on that board.

Now, we have consumed a good deal of time about this. I do not care to take any more. I do not live in Kansas City. My people, the banks in my district, petitioned to go to Chicago. They claimed their banking interests were at Chicago. If they had to go to either St. Louis or Chicago, they preferred to go to Chicago, because they said it was their natural gateway for the live-stock interests of that section, and the greater part of their business was being done there; but if they could have one of these banks nearer home, of course those people were interested in getting it, just as the people of these other communities were. Why, the banks that voted, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] told you, ought to have some voice in locating these banks. I do not know as they could arrive at a better plan, if they pursued it in the place where these banks were established, than submitting it to the banks.

Mr. BARTON. Do you know that they did that?

Mr. BOOHER. I understood the gentleman from Virginia to say that they did.

Mr. BARTON. I understood you to say that they laid out the territory and took the business.

Mr. BOOHER. I said if they took the votes of all the banks in that particular territory as to where they would rather go to transact their business it would have been a fair way, but the people who did not get a bank then would have been as much exercised as they are now.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for just another question?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Does this in any way cause you to lose your confidence in what might take place later on in the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. BOOHER. What do you mean by that?

Mr. FESS. There was fear all along that there would be favoritism or partisan politics used in the administration of a currency measure.

Mr. BOOHER. I do not believe any man will ever be elected President of the United States, I do not care to what party he belongs, that will ever use politics or permit it to warp or bias his judgment when it comes to enforcing the banking and financial laws of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Can you say that about President Jackson?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes, sir. I stand where Jackson stood. I read his veto message yesterday, and I wish you would read it, Professor, and learn something from it.

Mr. FESS. I have read it. You are not afraid there will be any partisan politics?

Mr. BOOHER. President Jackson did not exercise any partisan politics. Do you say, now, from reading the history of that transaction, that President Jackson vetoed the central bank bill because it was the central bank?

Mr. FESS. I say that when he removed Judge Duane because he would not remove the deposits, and put in another man, and then removed him because he would not do it, and then put in the third man and commanded him to do it, there was partisan politics in it, do not you?

Mr. BOOHER. No.

Mr. FESS. What was it?

Mr. BOOHER. It was simply a determination on the President's part that the central bank as it was then organized should no longer control the business of this country. That is what it was.

Mr. FESS. That is a different name for it.

Mr. BOOHER. It was a determination to put the banking interests of this country in the hands of the people, where they belong, and he did it. I wish I had time to discuss the question as it deserves to be discussed. What was the reason he vetoed the bill? He said that the stock of that bank was $28,000,000 and that $8,000,000 of it was owned in the city of London, England; and, in case of war, he said the country would be greatly embarrassed with one-fourth of their banking capital owned in a foreign country. That was one of his reasons. There were other and perhaps stronger reasons. However, the people stood by him and indorsed his action.

Mr. MANN. That was before we had moved the capital of the country from Washington to London, as we did last week.

Mr. BOOHER. No. The gentleman is obsessed with the idea that he may be called upon to bear arms in defense of his country against Great Britain.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is not afraid to bear arms.

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman is a few years older than I am [laughter], and if he unfortunately should be drafted I will promise to go in his place as a substitute without asking any money for doing it. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken. It would take a much more powerful man than the gentleman from Missouri to go in my place. [Laughter].

Mr. BOOHER. Well, in some places.

Mr. MANN. In case of war, I mean. I would not say anywhere else.

Mr. BOOHER. I am very sorry we got onto the Andrew Jackson part of it, but I may end that by saying that I am an Andrew Jackson Democrat, and I do not think he ever did a thing in his official life that I do not stand for to-day, and I wish we had more Andrew Jacksons in this country.

Mr. MANN. But not in the White House.

Mr. BOOHER. We have got one in the White House now, and that is what ails you. Why, I heard a gentleman over on that side this morning glorifying about the election in New Jersey and telling how the President had been turned down. Why, bless him, he had not read that the very county that makes up that congressional district in New Jersey gave 8,000 majority against Woodrow Wilson for President in the last election. Yet it only gave you 5,000 majority yesterday. If you keep on gaining in that way, you can not carry one congressional district out of twenty in the country by next fall.

Mr. MANN. We are willing to take the chances on that.

Mr. BOOHER. I know you are willing to take a chance on anything except fairness in the treatment of this administration and fairness in the treatment of the men who established the Federal reserve banks.

Now, I do not care to discuss that matter any more. I want to say to my friend from Omaha [Mr. SLOAN] that we got a regional bank at Kansas City because we were entitled to it, because the business interests of the country demanded that it should go there, and, in my judgment, that was the only matter considered by the board when it was established there; and I think the gentleman's statement that in that instance they were actuated by politics is all wrong. I think on sober second thought he will come to that conclusion. Omaha is a magnificent city. Her people are energetic and thrifty, but Omaha was not entitled to a regional bank. Her commercial importance did not entitle her to it.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not the gentleman think if they had selected some other places instead of those they did select, there would have been just as much kicking on the part of the places that were disappointed?

Mr. GLASS. No. If Baltimore or Washington had been selected, there would not have been one complaint from Richmond.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a very patriotic statement for the gentleman from Virginia to make——

Mr. GLASS. We would have acquiesced.

Mr. FOSTER. But there would have been the same turmoil on the part of other places all over the United States.

Mr. BOOHER. I can only answer for one place. I think that even if they had established two Federal reserve banks in Omaha, and then had given one to Kansas City, my friend from Omaha [Mr. SLOAN] would have found fault with that, or with any arrangement that could have been made.

Mr. FOSTER. And there would have been the same complaint from other disappointed cities.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think we would have been entitled to find fault if they had established two of these banks in Omaha?

Mr. BOOHER. I think the gentleman from Omaha [Mr. SLOAN] would have found fault if one had gone to Kansas City, even if he had two in his own city.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think we would have been entitled to find fault if there had been two located in Omaha?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes; and the country at large would have been entitled to find fault if there had been one located in Omaha, because Omaha was not entitled to it. It went to the right place.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BARTLETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 5850, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the following order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That all salaries of officers and employees of the United States provided for at current amounts in the bill H. R. 15279, for the fiscal year 1915, shall be considered as in order under the rules, as well as an amendment which shall fix permanently as the compensation or salary of any officer or employee the sum provided in the current law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the order?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if this is from the Committee on Rules?

The SPEAKER. No; it is an order offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask what it applies to?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It makes the salaries as reported in the legislative bill in order provided they are current law.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does it refer to the offices?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia objects.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I asked the gentleman from South Carolina if it applied to the offices, and I understood him to say that it did.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he has read the order carefully, and thinks it does not apply to anything or make anything in order except these salaries stated in the legislative bill that are current law.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, this is a rule, and offered in a very unusual way.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question: Does this order, if adopted, preclude or shut out points of order?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Wherever we have increased a salary, it does not. The point of order would lie just the same.

Mr. COX. Would it preclude or shut out amendments?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Oh, no.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does this rule reinsert in the bill the piecework proposition?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. No; it does not apply to any legislative proposition or anything of that kind. It is only to avoid troubles on points of order on salaries that were fixed 50 years ago.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does it extend to the consideration of future bills?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. No.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman will remember that points of order were made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] and were followed in some instances by a reinsertion of the statutory amount, but in other cases it was not so followed. How does the committee differentiate between the two?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. That part of the bill is passed and we are no longer concerned about that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In so far as I am familiar with the bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations, I have no objection to it. I have no objection to salaries included in it, but this is a very unusual course of procedure. The custom has always been where points of order were made and where it was necessary to come to the House in order to prevent them, they have come to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There never has been in the experience of myself, or, I think, of the gentleman from Tennessee such a situation as this. Here are salaries that men have been receiving for 30 years.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will pardon me, there has been an experience within our service.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I think the gentleman refers to the time when two Members of the House started in deliberately to filibuster; but here is an objection made simply because there is some old statute fixing a salary. Compensation has been carried in the bill for 10, 20, and 30 years, and points of order are made on account of some forgotten statute, and the result is that these items are being taken from the bill, while nobody dreams that they are to continue out of the bill. This order does not affect at all any salary that the committee proposed to increase in the bill. Wherever it is proposed to increase a salary a point of order will lie.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman from New York remember that once, on the military bill, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr.

Prince, made points of order against all increases over the statutory amount?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That was the case to which I referred. It was on the legislative bill, and before the bill was finished it was necessary to get a rule, because the bill was ridiculous; it was only a skeleton.

Mr. WILLIS. I would like to ask the gentleman if this rule or order applies to the provision for the purchase of typewriters?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Oh, it does not apply to any legislation. It does not apply to anything in the world except where the salary has been increased by former appropriation bills.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is impossible to tell in a good many cases what the statutory salary is.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I always hesitate to object to matters of this character, that ought to go to the Committee on Rules, because I happen to be a member of that committee, and an objection on the part of a member of that committee is ascribed to a selfish desire to bring that committee into consideration. This is, however, very unusual. I know of no procedure that has ever occurred in my experience similar to this.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the great body of the Dockery laws were put upon a bill just upon an order proposed by Mr. Dockery when Speaker Crisp was in the chair just before the House adjourned, as we propose to do now. It is not without precedent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Also the reorganization of the customs districts was made in the same way.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, this ought to take the usual course, I think.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee objects, and the order will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MCKELLAR, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, for one week, on account of important business.

CARIBOU NATIONAL FOREST RESERVE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resolution from the Senate:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
April 7, 1914.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 1739) to reserve certain lands and to incorporate the same and make them a part of the Caribou National Forest Reserve.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it seems to me that the committees of the House ought to be a little more careful about passing House bills when they have pending before them Senate bills of the same character. Several times now we have passed House bills, sent them to the Senate, and the Senate has passed them and then asked us to return identical Senate bills which the Senate had passed and sent over here. The committees that have these bills before them ought to keep track of them and know what is before them. I do not object.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 474. An act to authorize the issuance of unqualified patents to public lands in certain cases.

S. 4943. An act to amend section 1 of an act of Congress approved April 9, 1912 (37 Stats., p. 80), entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to secure for the United States title to patented lands in the Yosemite National Park, and for other purposes.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all those who have spoken to-day on the bill H. R. 5850 be allowed to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. What is the object of this?

Mr. WATKINS. Some of those who have spoken to-day have requested this privilege, and I simply submit the request.

Mr. MANN. Quite a number of them have already asked for unanimous consent themselves. We have just granted unanimous consent to everybody to extend their remarks on the tolls bill. On this bill to-day the debate has been largely political, and I do not think we ought to do these things wholesale. Is this to extend remarks on the bill?

Mr. WATKINS. The request is made by some of those who did not speak on the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if it is possible now to make an agreement about closing debate when we take the matter up on the next Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman better make that request on Wednesday. I do not know that there will be any further general debate.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 9, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of Labor, transmitting an item of appropriation to be included in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, as follows: $4,200 for the purchase of safety paper for certificates of naturalization now required by law to be immediately available (H. Doc. No. 889), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. FERGUSSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7327) for the relief of Charles L. Hill, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 510), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1008) granting a pension to W. D. Clark; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 8166) granting an increase of pension to Alfred T. Johnson; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 10229) granting a pension to Daniel Madigan; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 14057) granting a pension to Mary Jane Kuhns; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 14101) granting a pension to Winfield S. Hicks; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 4353) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 14128) granting permission to Lieut. Col. John P. Finley to accept and wear a decoration presented by the Sultan of Turkey; Committee on Military Affairs discharged, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. PADGETT: A bill (H. R. 15464) providing for the purchase of a site and the erection thereon of a public building at Dickson, in the State of Tennessee; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. VAUGHAN: A bill (H. R. 15465) to prescribe the duties and liabilities of common carriers engaged in interstate commerce, as at common law, and to prohibit such carriers from limiting or restricting their duties and liabilities under the common law; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas: A bill (H. R. 15466) to regulate lobbying and to require every legislative counsel and agent employed by any person, corporation, or association to promote or defeat legislation to register and to render an accurate account of all moneys expended by him in such capacity, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WHALEY: A bill (H. R. 15467) to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of South Carolina on or near the seacoast; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. CHURCH: A bill (H. R. 15468) directing that the present line of Government steamships operated by the Panama Railroad Co., a corporation, between the port of New York and that of Colon, in the Canal Zone, be extended from Colon via the Panama Canal so as to connect with the principal ports of the Pacific coast in the United States, and creating a fund designated as the "United States merchant marine aid fund," to consist of the receipts from tolls on vessels engaged in coastwise commerce passing through the Panama Canal, and to be expended for the development of the domestic and foreign commerce of the United States; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15469) to amend an act entitled "An act to protect the locators in good faith of oil and gas lands who shall have effected an actual discovery of oil or gas on the public lands of the United States, or their successors in interest," approved March 2, 1911; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. ABERCROMBIE: A bill (H. R. 15470) to require the Commissioner of Education to devise methods and promote plans for the elimination of adult illiteracy in the United States; to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey: Resolution (H. Res. 461) authorizing the expenditure of a sum not exceeding $2,000 for the purpose of folding speeches; to the Committee on Accounts.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BATHRICK: A bill (H. R. 15471) granting an increase of pension to James E. March; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BELL of California: A bill (H. R. 15472) for the relief of C. G. Jahn; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. McLAUGHLIN: A bill (H. R. 15493) granting a pension to Maggie Feavel; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MOSS of West Virginia: A bill (H. R. 15494) for the relief of L. D. Taylor, administrator of estate of E. T. Stout, deceased; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. NEELY of West Virginia: A bill (H. R. 15495) authorizing Maj. Clyde S. Ford, Medical Corps, to accept and wear the decoration tendered him by the Ottoman and Bulgarian Governments for services rendered in the Balkan wars; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. POST: A bill (H. R. 15496) granting a pension to Mary A. Rose; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15497) granting an increase of pension to Melville Whiteman; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RUBEY: A bill (H. R. 15498) granting an increase of pension to John H. Herod; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15499) granting an increase of pension to William H. Surridge; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15500) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Watson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. UNDERHILL: A bill (H. R. 15501) granting a pension to Sarah E. Benjamin; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 15502) granting an increase of pension to Michael Baker; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Thirteen resolutions of citizens of Indiana, Michigan, and Ohio, against practice of polygamy in the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also (by request), petition of the St. Louis (Mo.) Medical Society, against removal of the library in the Surgeon General's Office to the Library of Congress; to the Committee on the Library.

Also (by request), petition of the Kauai Chamber of Commerce, Hawaii, favoring House bill 1994, to improve Nawiliwili Harbor, Hawaii; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. ALLEN: Protests of Emil E. Hoffmann and 152 other residents of Cincinnati, Ohio, against resolution providing for national prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of Arthur Rood and 25 other citizens of Cincinnati, Ohio, favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. ASHBROOK: Petition of 32 citizens of Johnstown, Ohio, in favor of nation-wide prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, resolutions of the Christian Endeavor Society of Strasburg, Ohio, in favor of nation-wide prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, resolutions of the Lutheran Sunday School of Strasburg, Ohio, in favor of nation-wide prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, resolutions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Pataskala, Ohio, in favor of nation-wide prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BAILEY (by request): Petitions of Olois Aust, George Karr, R. S. Spangler, and 37 other citizens of Johnstown, Pa., against nation-wide prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 9, 1914.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come to Thee, we trust, with no reluctance of worship or homage. We bow ourselves before Thee, the Supreme One. The one true and living God we worship and adore and praise. Thou art worthy to receive all our adoration. The revelation that Thou hast made of Thyself to men exceeds all the glory of earth. Every path that we follow leads to Thee. In all the track of our human reason, all the fathomless abyss of spirit, and all the wide flights of fancy we are finding God. God is everywhere glorious. We worship Thee and pray Thy blessing upon us in the discharge of the duties of this day. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of the Sunday school of the Congregational Church of Hill, N. H., and a petition of the congregation of the Congregational Church of Campton, N. H., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I present resolutions adopted by the Manufacturers' Association of the city of Bridgeport, Conn., relative to the establishment of trade commissions and outlining regulations for the control of corporations. I ask that the resolutions may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION OF THE CITY OF BRIDGEPORT (INC.),
410–411 Court Exchange, April 6, 1914.

Hon. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: We beg to advise that at a meeting of the executive board of this association held Thursday, April 2, 1914, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas various bills have been introduced in Congress, and now being considered by them, to establish commissions and outlining regulations for the control of corporations; and

"Whereas the provisions of these bills, as at present drawn, are, in our opinion, such as to interfere seriously with general business methods, and are so far-reaching that they would tend to cause considerable unrest in the business of those affected; and

"Whereas matters of such vast importance to the country should receive most careful and earnest consideration before being acted upon, we, the Manufacturers' Association of the City of Bridgeport, Conn. (Inc.), representing some 90 large and varied manufacturing industries employing over 30,000 hands, hereby

"Resolve, That we earnestly urge upon Congress the importance of careful consideration of all the provisions proposed in the before-mentioned bills, and that every opportunity be given to the business interests of the country to present, with utmost detail, all the advantages or disadvantages that might accrue to said interests through the enactment of the proposed legislation; and it is further

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each Senator and Representative from this State."

We believe that the matters dealt with by these resolutions are of very deep and vast importance to our members, and we would therefore very much appreciate your giving them your serious and careful consideration.

Very truly, yours,

THE MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION (INC.),
F. A. BENNETT, Secretary.

Mr. NORRIS presented a memorial of the German-American Alliance of Nebraska, remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ROOT, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the bill (S. 4254) to enable the Secretary of War to pay the amount awarded to the Malambo fire claimants by the joint commission under article 6 of the treaty of November 18, 1903, between the United States and Panama, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 412) thereon.

Mr. SHIVELY, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12014) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 413) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BURLEIGH:

A bill (S. 5191) granting an increase of pension to Martha A. Heath; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WARREN (by request):

A bill (S. 5192) authorizing the purchase of certain lands chiefly valuable for timber and for the growth of timber in the State of Wyoming; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. PITTMAN (for Mr. CHILTON):

A bill (S. 5193) authorizing Maj. Clyde S. Ford, Medical Corps, United States Army, to accept and wear the decoration tendered to him by the Ottoman and Bulgarian Governments for services rendered in the Balkan wars (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

By Mr. JOHNSON:

A bill (S. 5194) providing for the erection of a statue to the memory of Gen. John Sullivan; to the Committee on the Library.

AMENDMENT TO AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ROBINSON submitted an amendment proposing to strike out the clause in the Agricultural appropriation bill appropriating $50,000 for all necessary expenses for enforcing the provisions of the act approved March 4, 1914, relating to the protection of migratory game and insectivorous birds, intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

SAFETY OF LIFE AT SEA.

Mr. SHIVELY. I submit the following order, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Printing.

The order was read and referred to the Committee on Printing, as follows:

Ordered, That 2,000 copies of the International Convention Relating to Safety of Life at Sea, the detailed regulations thereunder, the final protocol, and the "Voeux" expressed by the conference, all signed at London, January 20, 1914; the report from the United States Commissions to the International Conference on Safety of Life at Sea, giving a summary of subjects considered and the conclusions arrived at by the conference, together with the messages of the President of the United States transmitting the same; the memorial of International Seamen's Union; and the report to the President of the United States submitted by Andrew Furuseth after his resignation as a commissioner from the United States, with accompanying illustrations, be printed in one volume for the use of the Senate.

IMPORTATION OF GOODS IN AMERICAN VESSELS.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 335), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to communicate to the Senate the full text of the recent opinion of the Board of United States General Appraisers on the construction of the clause in the tariff act of 1913 allowing a 5 per cent discount on goods imported in American vessels.

HARBOR TONNAGE AND CONSTRUCTION OF LOCKS.

Mr. BRISTOW. I send to the desk a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its consideration. I do not think it will be the cause of any debate at all.

The resolution (S. Res. 336) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate a detailed statement for the year 1913 of the incoming and outgoing tonnage of each harbor in the United States; also the number of locks that the Government of the United States has constructed, their location, cost of their construction, number of men employed in their operation, cost of their operation, and for the year 1913 the tonnage that passed through them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. OVERMAN. The resolution is directed to the Secretary of the Treasury. It seems to me it ought to be directed to the Secretary of War. The Corps of Engineers, under the War Department, constructed the locks.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Secretary of the Treasury pays all the bills.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. BRISTOW submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 337), which was read:

Resolved, That in addition to the information as to river and harbor improvements furnished the Senate April 6, 1914 (S. Doc. No. 462), in response to a resolution of March 25, the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate a detailed statement, by States, and for each river and each harbor and for each canal, of the amounts that have been authorized and contracted for river, harbor, and canal improvements, the payments for which had not been made and were not included in the information furnished the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire that it shall go over until to-morrow.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will say that I am going to ask that every resolution shall go over until to-morrow, because I want to shorten the morning hour as much as possible in view of the announcement which has been made.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will say to the Senator that we have now a document which is in course of publication giving the expenses of the river and harbor improvements, and this will be a supplement to it. I should like to have the information soon, so that it may be sent to the printer.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If we can vote upon the resolution at once, I will withdraw the objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

RURAL CREDITS AND AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION WORK.

Mr. WORKS. I have here an interesting letter from Mr. J. A. Everett on the subject of rural credits and agricultural extension work. I should like to have it printed in the RECORD. It is short.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., April 3, 1914.

HON. JOHN D. WORKS,
Care United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WORKS: Received a copy of your speech on cooperative agricultural-extension work, and read it with much interest.

Mr. WORKS, you did not touch on the vital parts of this agricultural-extension work. The vital part is that if such a law is made and put in operation that it will be a positive injury to farmers and a calamity to our country. You can figure it out for yourself, that invariably the largest crops sell for the least money, and the smallest crops sell for the most money. So whatever scheme is put in practice that results in greatly increasing the crops must result, under present marketing conditions understand, in decreasing the price. And if it does this it will be a curse to the farmers rather than a benefit. And what is bad for the farmers is bad for the whole country.

But should the bill become a law and be put in operation the effort to increase production, even though tens of millions of dollars are added to the sum that is being spent annually now, will be positively impotent under present marketing conditions. All of the money spent in the last 40 years, or since agricultural colleges and experiment stations were established, amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars, by the Federal Government, and probably an equal sum by the States, has failed to increase the average acre yields of our crops even by a fraction of a bushel per acre. In fact, the fertility of our soil is being exhausted faster than science can devise ways to increase the production by superior machines and cultivation and improved seed.

I make this prediction:

Should Congress pass an agricultural-extension work bill and appropriate millions of dollars for carrying it out, that in the next 10 or 20 years we will see no appreciable results from it in increased crops. But should I be mistaken in this and should the farmers realize increased production because of such definite efforts, they will not be better off financially but will be worse off financially than without the expenditure of this great sum of money.

If you are a real, true friend of the farmers, and if you are interested in keeping the taxes of the people down, you will study this matter along lines that I have mentioned and you will arrive at some surprising conclusions. To help you understand this matter I refer you to a pamphlet inclosed herewith, the title being "An open letter to the bankers of America."

Would like to have an acknowledgment of this and would also like to have the names of the Senators who might be appealed to to give this matter of rural-extension work consideration from the standpoint of possible benefits to the farmers and their sense of justice to the taxpayers of our country.

Let me say before concluding, that if you will go far enough and investigate this rural-extension work you will find that the boards of trade, the chambers of commerce, and produce and cotton exchanges are back of this, and that they are using the agricultural colleges as a cat's-paw to pull the chestnuts of greater production over. They are not interested in the farmers except to have them work as hard as they can to produce the greatest crop they possibly can, so that there will be more to handle and store and gamble and speculate in. They are using the argument of the high cost of living, and that there is not enough produced in this country as a cloak to hide their scheme. But, regardless of how much is produced, there is very little effect on the market where the laborer buys his supplies.

And just one more thought before I conclude, and that is that the most important thing before the people of our country to-day is a safe and sound and scientific marketing system, so that farmers will get a just return and fair reward and profit for what they produce. Such a system as will at least give them as much for a big crop as they get for a small one.

Will you furnish me with some names of Senators as asked for above?

Yours, very truly,

J. A. EVERITT,
President Farmers' Society of Equity.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, my attention has been called to a newspaper article of this morning in which I am quoted concerning the recent elections, as follows:

The results are significant. It would seem that the administration's "honeymoon" is coming to an end.

The expression is an old one, which has been credited to me for the last six months in various publications. I never used it on any occasion. I specifically refused to comment on the recent election contests, and desire to deny my authorship of the phrase or my use of it on any occasion, past or present.

While I made no comment on the recent elections, it might not be out of place at this time to say that I was gratified that in three contests two Democrats were successful.

If the Republicans find comfort in winning one contest out of three, their prospects of rehabilitation are not very encouraging.

I may not always agree with the President, but our differences will never affect my respect for his person or the high office which he occupies; and I hope that I shall never see the day when I shall rejoice in the defeat of a Democrat for any office.

LOCATION OF FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 332, submitted yesterday by Mr. HITCHCOCK, as follows:

Resolved, That the organization committee of the Federal Reserve Board be, and it is hereby, directed to send to the Senate copies of all briefs and written arguments made by each city applying to the organization committee for the location of a Federal reserve bank, together with the reasons relied upon by the organization committee in fixing the boundaries of the reserve districts and locating the reserve cities.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], who offered the resolution, is not in the Chamber, and I ask that it may be laid over until he comes in. I think when he understands the situation he will hardly feel that it is necessary to press the resolution. I have a copy of the reasons of the organization committee in my hand. The document has gone to the printer. It gives all the information that is asked for in the resolution, I think, except the arguments, and there is a cartload of them. I do not know what the Senate would do with them if it had them. It would take at least a cart to bring them in. There is a cartload of them, and I do not think the Senator from Nebraska will want to have all that matter printed in any shape.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the resolution will go over without prejudice.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	James	Perkins	Smoot
Borah	Johnson	Pittman	Sterling
Brady	Jones	Poindexter	Sutherland
Brandegee	Kenyon	Pomerene	Swanson
Bristow	Kern	Robinson	Thomas
Bryan	Lee, Md.	Root	Thompson
Burton	Lodge	Saulsbury	Thornton
Clapp	McCumber	Shafroth	Vardaman
Clark, Wyo.	Martin, Va.	Sheppard	Walsh
Crawford	Martine, N. J.	Sherman	Warren
Dillingham	Nelson	Shively	West
Fall	O'Gorman	Simmons	Williams
Gallinger	Oliver	Smith, Ga.	Works
Hitchcock	Overman	Smith, Md.
Hollis	Owen	Smith, Mich.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY]. He has a general pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce for the day the absence of my colleague [Mr. CULBERSON] and to state that he is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT].

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was requested to announce the absence of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] because of illness in his family.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. He is away from the city and is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the desire to unite the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by an isthmian canal goes back almost to the first discovery of the continent. It was the dream of the early navigators, and from that day to this has never been absent from the minds of men. It is not necessary to trace through the centuries the long history of the canal project which, with ever-increasing intensity, engaged the attention of statesmen and of Governments and stimulated the ambition of engineers. For my present purpose it is sufficient to set forth very briefly those past transactions which have given rise to the conditions and to the questions with which we must deal to-day. The controversy which now divides opinion and gives birth to contending arguments began with the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850. At that time we were engaged in a dispute with Great Britain of a threatening character, and one which involved the canal routes. Great Britain had solemnly set up in Honduras a local Indian whom, with a fine lack of humor, it invested with the title of "The Mosquito King." Over this ancient and renowned monarchy it had established a protectorate, and with this excuse for interference it proposed to take possession of certain points on the coast of Honduras and Nicaragua. As an offset to this action on the part of Great Britain, Elijah Hise, American chargé d'affaires at Guatemala, without instructions, made a treaty with that country and also with Honduras and Nicaragua, securing to the United States the largest rights in that region for the construction of a canal. He had done this before Mr. E. George Squier could supersede him in the capacity of chargé d'affaires to Central America, and when Squier reached his post Hise, with his treaties, was already on his way to Washington. Squier, much disturbed, decided to ignore the work of Hise and proceeded to make new treaties, ostensibly according to instructions. He first made a treaty with Nicaragua which gave all the canal rights to the United States, and he followed this up by making a treaty with Honduras in order to defeat the schemes of Great Britain by securing the cession or sale of Tigre Island. Like Hise, Squier exceeded his instructions, but the treaties were none the less made and sent to Washington.

Meantime Great Britain had seized Tigre Island. The situation therefore had become very threatening, for if the Squier treaty went into the Senate ratification was reasonably certain, and the dispute between the two countries would have then become so acute that there would have been great danger of war. To avoid the perils of this situation the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was hastily made. Upon the terms of that treaty, which have of late years been so much discussed, it is not necessary to enter in any detail. The essential proposition was that the Governments of the United States and Great Britain agreed that neither one nor the other would ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the isthmian ship canal, and they also agreed to invite every other State with which they had friendly intercourse to enter into similar stipulations. By the first agreement they tied their hands in regard to the construction of the canal; by the second the United States abandoned its well-considered policy of excluding any European interference with American affairs and actually invited such interference. The situation was further complicated by our agreeing through an exchange of diplomatic notes that the treaty did not include British Honduras in its terms. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was a most unfortunate arrangement. To remove an existing embarrassment it committed the United States to obligations pregnant with future troubles. It was an improvident treaty. It sacrificed the future to the present and was guilty of that worst of diplomatic errors which consists in escaping an immediate difficulty by disregarding contingencies which might, and in this case were certain to, arise.

In due time the blunder of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty made itself felt, although for many years nothing was heard of it. Immediately after its ratification the contest over slavery was renewed with ever-increasing intensity; then came the Civil War; and after the war had ended the country was absorbed in the settlement of the questions which were the legacy of the great struggle to preserve the Union of the States. Gradually these questions were disposed of and the movement across the continent, in which the American people were engaged, was completed. Railroads were built which united the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. The interior frontiers, which had been divided by wilderness and desert, occupied only by wandering Indian tribes, had come together, and the American people began to turn their attention to the great interests beyond their borders which they had always possessed, but which had slumbered during the lifetime of a generation. The desire to build an isthmian canal revived in full force and was accompanied with a determination to undertake the work.

As we thus drew closer to the period of actual performance we found ourselves confronted by the engagements of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It was discovered with some surprise that by the terms of that unfortunate and well-nigh forgotten agreement we were not only hampered but actually fettered in any attempt to build an isthmian canal upon conditions which we were willing to accept. As this situation became better understood, the country began to chafe under the treaty restrictions which it had hardly realized and which seemed designed to thwart its just aspirations for the solution of the great problem which for several generations had engaged the attention of every farseeing statesman. Restive under this restraint the popular demand for the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty began to assume formidable and threatening proportions. No responsible Government, however, can contemplate without the gravest anxiety the abrogation of a treaty, except for causes which would justify or even necessitate war. Only once in our history had we ever abrogated a treaty, and it was in the highest degree undesirable that, in a time of profound peace, and when the War with Spain had but recently ended, we should proceed to take such violent action if by any honorable means it could be avoided.

Under these conditions Mr. Hay, representing President McKinley, opened negotiations with the Government of Great Britain for the removal of this obstacle to the construction of the canal. The result was the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty. That treaty was intended to supersede the Clayton-Bulwer treaty but, following too closely the terms of the Suez Canal treaties, contained provisions which the Senate of the United States very properly declined to accept. The gravest error, as it seemed to the Senate, was a repetition of one of the mistakes of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in inviting the nations of Europe to join with us in guaranteeing the neutrality of the canal. Such a provision was not only an abandonment of the Monroe doctrine but, what was even worse, it disregarded entirely our national policy of preventing the interference of Europe in American affairs. The Senate struck out this provision. The committee reported, and the Senate adopted, an amendment to the effect that the first five rules should not apply to any measures which the United States might take for its own defense or the maintenance of public order. It also made another very important change. The first Hay-Pauncefote treaty modified the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and to that extent superseded it. How far it superseded it was disputed. It was argued here that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty necessarily superseded entirely the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but the Senate in order to leave no doubt upon this point inserted the words "which is hereby superseded." Thus amended, the treaty was ratified by the Senate and sent to England. Lord Lansdowne's note refusing to accept the Senate amendments showed that those who desired a specific statement of the supersession of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty were right in their contention that the supersession was not complete as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty originally stood. By this action of the British Government in declining to accept the Senate amendments the treaty failed.

Negotiations were at once opened for a new treaty. The draft was sent to London and the points in dispute contained in this new draft were then settled by Mr. Choate and Lord Lansdowne, who really made the second treaty, although it is known by the names of the signers, Mr. Hay and Lord Pauncefote. The second Hay-Pauncefote treaty embodied in fact and in principle all the Senate amendments. The provision for inviting other nations to join in the guaranty of the neutrality of the canal had disappeared and so had the prohibition upon the erection of fortifications, while the preamble set forth that the purpose of the treaty was to remove any obstacle to the construction of the canal contained in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, reserving nothing from that treaty except the "general principle of neutralization." The treaty in its new form was ratified by the Senate on December 16, 1901, by a vote of 72 to 6. On February 21, 1902, ratifications were exchanged and the treaty became binding both upon Great Britain and the United States. When this treaty was thus made and ratified the canal route under consideration was that by way of Nicaragua. It is not necessary here to trace the history of the events, of the investigations or the discussions which led to the substitution of the Panama route for that through Nicaragua, because, although the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was ratified when the Nicaragua route alone was in contemplation, it applied by its terms to the construction of a canal at any point on the Isthmus.

Two years later a treaty with Panama was negotiated and was ratified by the Senate on the 23d of February, 1904, ratifications being exchanged with Panama three days later, on the 26th of February, 1904. It was under this treaty that the United States obtained its title—and I may say a perfect title—to the Canal Zone and its right to construct a canal. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty was between the United States and Great Britain alone, its main purpose being the supersession of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, so as to remove that obstacle to the construction of an isthmian canal. It, of course, gave the United States neither title nor opportunity to build a canal; it merely removed an obstruction. The treaty with Panama, upon which our title rests, and without which the canal could not have been built, has been too much overlooked in these debates. In addition to the payment of $10,000,000 as the price or compensation for the rights, powers, and privileges granted by the Republic of Panama to the United States, the treaty also secured to the Government of the Republic of Panama the right to "transport over the canal its vessels and its troops and munitions of war in such vessels at all times without paying charges of any kind." It is not clear from this language that the Government of the United States made any grant to Panama of the right to pass its merchant vessels through the canal without payment of tolls, for article 19 applies apparently only to the vessels of the Republic—that is, naval vessels and those carrying troops and munitions of war. This grant, whether limited or not, was part of the compensation for the title obtained by the United States, without which the canal could not have been built, and does not therefore sustain the arguments in support of the exemption of the merchant vessels of the United States from tolls, because unless we had secured our title and building rights from Panama there would have been no canal. No nation could and no nation did object to the consideration paid to Panama for our rights and title on the Canal Zone. It further is to be noted that in the treaty with Panama the United States was given the right to establish fortifications, a right which could be conferred or withheld by Panama alone. As I have already stated, there was a prohibition of the establishment of fortifications in the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty which was omitted in the second treaty, and therefore no objection can be raised to the establishment of fortifications by the United States, as that right is expressly given it by the only authority which had the power to grant it—the Republic of Panama. Nothing in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as it stands can possibly affect this explicit grant from the Republic of Panama.

The most important feature, however, of the treaty with Panama, so far as the present discussion is concerned, is article 18, which says:

> The canal, when constructed, and the entrance thereto shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3 of, and in conformity with all the stipulations of, the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901.

Section 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 provided as follows:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Thus it will be seen that by article 18 of the Panama treaty the section just quoted from the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made a part of the Panama treaty and must be so regarded. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty, as has just been said, concerned only Great Britain and the United States and grew out of previous arrangements between those two powers, but the treaty with the Republic of Panama upon which the title of the United States and its right to build the canal rest affected in its terms all nations using the canal, and was notice to the world not only of the title of the United States to build the canal, but of the terms upon which that canal should be built and used, so far as it concerned the vessels and commerce of all other nations. In this way section 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was raised to a position where it touched all nations, and therefore gave to all nations the right to ask that they should be treated in accordance with the terms of the treaty by which the United States obtained right and title to the construction of the canal. In other words, under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we are responsible to Great Britain alone for the fulfillment of the terms of the treaty; but in the treaty with Panama, by virtue of which we hold our title to the Canal Zone, as well as the right to build the canal, we extend our responsibility for the due observance of the rules laid down to all nations using the canal.

By the Panama Canal act, approved August 24, 1912, it was provided in section 5 that no tolls should be levied upon vessels passing through the canal which were engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States. This is the provision which has given rise to the present controversy, and in considering it the first step is to determine exactly what this clause accomplished. This is not altogether easy to do, because the language which grants the exemption to certain vessels of the United States is loose in definition. Under our navigation laws there are in reality three classes of vessels, if we classify them according to the trade in which they are engaged. In the first place there are the vessels of American registry engaged exclusively in foreign trade, which clearly do not come within the exemption. Then, there are vessels which by enrollment and license are engaged in the coastwise trade and can not touch or trade at any foreign port in the course of their coastwise voyage without forfeiting their enrollment and license as well as the vessel itself. Vessels of this class come clearly within the exemption. But there is yet a third class consisting of vessels enrolled and licensed for coastwise trade which also take out and sail under a register permitting them to touch for commercial purposes at foreign ports in the course of a coastwise voyage, and of vessels holding an American register for foreign trade which also engage in coastwise trade; that is, a vessel engaged under register in foreign trade or a vessel enrolled and licensed for the coastwise trade and holding also a register for foreign trade, enabling it to touch for commercial purposes at a foreign port in the course of a coastwise voyage, could sail under the register from New York to New Orleans and on the way would have the right to touch for commercial purposes at, let us say, Jamaica or Cuba. It is not at all clear whether vessels of this third class come within the exemption or not. The fact that Congress refused to insert the word "exclusively" after the word "engaged" in the exemption clause just quoted would seem to indicate that it was the intention of Congress to include in the exemption not only vessels engaged in the coastwise trade and holding nothing but enrollment and license, but licensed vessels or vessels in foreign trade which have a register allowing them to touch and trade at foreign ports in the course of their coastwise voyage. To those who think that there is a distinction to be drawn for the purpose of exemption from tolls between vessels engaged in the coastwise trade and those engaged in foreign trade, this question of the vessels which may be said to have both rights is of importance. If the view expressed by ex-President Roosevelt, that we have the right to exempt our coastwise vessels, because to do so involves no discrimination against the vessels of other countries, be accepted it is clear that a coastwise vessel with the right to touch and trade at foreign ports during its coastwise voyage would be excluded, because by carrying cargo and passengers from foreign ports they would come in immediate competition with the vessels of other nations.

In Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., p. 332), which has been frequently cited during the debate on the tolls, the court took substantially the same ground in reference to the general favored-nation clause as that taken by ex-President Roosevelt in regard to canal tolls. The court held that a State law exempting coastwise vessels from pilotage charges was not in conflict with our treaties, because, in the language of Mr. Justice White, such exemption "did not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels." The test of the validity of the exemption, in the opinion of the court, lay in the existence or nonexistence of discrimination against vessels of other nations. Applying this test of discrimination it is clear that those who draw a distinction between coastwise vessels and vessels engaged in foreign trade must hold that neither those engaged exclusively in foreign trade nor those engaged in both coastwise and foreign trade can be exempt from tolls under the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It seems clear to me also that if enrolled and licensed vessels can be employed in such a way as to compete with the vessels of foreign nations, then they also would fall outside the rule laid down by the Supreme Court in the pilotage case and by ex-President Roosevelt with reference to exemption from tolls under the Hay-Pauncefote and Panama treaties. The only point where the distinction between the different classes of vessels can be made is found in the provision which says that there shall be no discrimination against any nation; that is, even enrolled and licensed vessels of the coastwise trade can be distinguished as such only on the ground that their exemption from tolls does not involve discrimination against the vessels of other nations. It is not the character of the trade in which they are engaged which would make the exemption legitimate, but the fact that by the exemption there is no discrimination against the vessels of other nations. But if we consider the conditions carefully it will be seen that it is just as possible to produce a discrimination against the vessels of another nation by enrolled and licensed vessels engaged exclusively in the coastwise trade as by vessels engaged in foreign trade. A vessel, for example, going by way of the canal from Portland, Me., to Portland, Oreg., may easily be able, if exempted from the tolls, to take freight shipped by rail from certain interior points in Canada at a lower rate than Canadian or British or German vessels going from Quebec to Vancouver, and this would at once constitute a discrimination. A foreign vessel, again, may shift cargo at Colon to an American enrolled and licensed vessel and thereby escape tolls and discriminate against another foreign vessel going direct, let us say, from Hamburg to San Francisco. To repeat the same idea in other words, the mere fact that a vessel is engaged exclusively in coastwise trade does not necessarily bring it within the distinction afforded by the language of the treaty in regard to discrimination.

I have called attention to the confusion which arises from the lack of an exact definition of vessels exempted in the language of the canal act so that if the exemption is to remain it may be amended in such a way as to leave no doubt as to the vessels which it is intended to exempt. I do not advance this point nor that which relates to the distinction among vessels based on the discrimination provision as having any bearing upon my own personal attitude, because I do not think that any distinction can be drawn, under the language of the treaty, between vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, in the foreign trade, or in both. The treaty says "vessels of commerce and of war of all nations," and under those words, aside from the question of discrimination which I have just discussed, I can see no possibility of distinguishing a vessel of commerce engaged in the coastwise trade from a vessel of commerce engaged in the foreign trade. To me personally it is wholly indifferent whether these distinctions are accepted or rejected because, holding as I do that the phrase "all vessels of commerce" covers all vessels of commerce of every country, whether engaged in the coastwise or foreign trade, I am of opinion that under the terms of the treaty we have a legal right to exempt our own vessels no matter what trade they are engaged in. In my view, if we admit that we have not the legal right to exempt from tolls vessels engaged in foreign trade we have no right to exempt or refuse to collect tolls from vessels of the United States engaged in any trade. I think, however, as I have just said, that we have the legal right to exempt or refuse to collect tolls from all vessels of the United States. I am speaking here only of vessels of commerce. Vessels of war of the United States of course pass through the canal without tolls because that is one of our rights for the protection of the canal. This is fully recognized by Sir Edward Grey when he says that the United States being practical sovereign of the canal, the right of the United States to exercise belligerent rights for the protection of the canal is not questioned.

In support of this interpretation of the treaty as to vessels of commerce many elaborate arguments have been made in the past, and no doubt many more will be made in the course of the present debate by those who favor the exercise of the right of exempting vessels of the United States from the payment of tolls. I shall therefore endeavor to state my own reasons for holding this view as briefly as possible. I was a member of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate which reported the amendments to the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I had some part in framing those amendments, and, owing to the death of Senator Davis, I was in charge of the treaty when, as amended, it was ratified by the Senate. It so chanced that I was in London when Mr. Choate and Lord Lansdowne were concluding the negotiations which resulted in the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and I was familiar with the discussions which then took place. When the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty was sent to the Senate it devolved upon me to report the treaty to the Senate. I mention these facts merely to show that I was in a position to be familiar with all the proceedings which ultimately resulted in the ratification of the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I took the view then that under the terms of the treaty of November 18, 1901, the United States was at liberty to exempt its own vessels of commerce from the payment of tolls if it saw fit to do so, and I voted against the Bard amendment, which made this right explicit, because I thought it needless. Let me digress for a moment to say that of the 70 Senators who actually voted upon the Bard amendment, only 11 are Members of the Senate now—3 Democrats and 8 Republicans. The votes in favor of the Bard amendment numbered 27; 8 Republicans and 19 Democrats, who showed by their votes that they wished to be able to subsidize American coastwise vessels passing through the canal and that they thought that the treaty as it stood did not assure to them this opportunity. The opinion which I formed in 1901 as to our rights under the treaty I have never changed; I hold it now, as I did 13 years ago, and my reasons for this opinion, briefly stated, are as follows:

The second Hay-Pauncefote treaty not only authorizes the United States, so far as Great Britain is concerned, to build a canal through the territory of some other power, but adds a clause, which did not exist in the rejected treaty, to the effect that no change of territorial sovereignty of the country or countries traversed by the canal shall affect the obligations of the parties to the treaty, which seems to assent in advance to the acquisition by the United States of the territory required for the canal. Subsequently the United States acquired the Canal Zone, and under the clause which I have just cited it will be seen that the terms of the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty apply to a canal constructed by a State on territory of its own obtained for that purpose. The second Hay-Pauncefote treaty also omitted article 3 of the rejected treaty, which provided that other powers were to have notice of the treaty and be invited to adhere to it, which clause, as I have already pointed out, was one of the principal objections of the Senate to the first draft.

It is clear, therefore, that the United States has rightfully, and in accordance with the terms of the treaty, built the canal through territory which is its own for canal purposes, although the ultimate sovereignty remains with the Republic of Panama, and the treaty accords to the United States all rights incident to building the canal. It is also clear that in undertaking the canal on these terms the United States did so with the purpose of excluding all foreign control beyond the stipulation to preserve the "general principle" of neutralization and for equality of terms to all users of the canal. Such being the case, it is necessary next to inquire what there is in the language of the treaty to justify the assertion that the United States is prevented by this state of facts from allowing the use of the canal by its own vessels or by the vessels of its merchant marine on any terms which it chooses to establish. Those who deny the right of the United States to exempt its own vessels rest their case on the language of the first rule of article 3, which declares that—

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality—and more particularly upon the proposition that the words "all nations" must include the United States. I freely admit that this is a fairly arguable point, but it does not seem to me that the words "all nations" in this connection necessarily include the United States. My reasons for taking this view are that this article in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is a contract with Great Britain, and as embodied in the treaty with Panama becomes a contract with all the world, by which the builder and owner of the canal fixes the terms upon which it grants the use of the canal to all other nations. As Mr. Olney in his argument has pointed out, the treaty in this respect was needed for that purpose only, because it was not necessary to fix the terms upon which the United States and its citizens should use the canal, inasmuch as its use by the citizens of the United States, without tolls or otherwise, as the United States might determine, was a necessary incident of the ownership of the canal. I also agree with Mr. Olney in the proposition, which he states in a manner beyond improvement, "that it can not reasonably be argued that in fixing the terms for the use of its canal by customers the United States looked upon itself as one of the customers." In construing the language of the first rule, upon which the claim that the United States is to be regarded as one of its own customers rests, it must be remembered that there are five other rules. A mere reading of these five other rules shows at once that they do not apply to the United States but to the citizens or subjects of other nations who shall use the canal. It seems to me difficult, as a general proposition, to argue that five of these six rules adopted by the United States for the use of the canal should not apply to the United States and that one and one only should so apply. It seems to me also that these rules must all be construed together. Admitting, as I think it must be admitted, that the canal passes through a zone which, for canal purposes, practically belongs to the United States, it would seem that the general rule of international law in regard to such cases applies. That rule, as laid down by Moore in his third volume, page 268, citing the case of The Avon (18 International Review Record, 165), is as follows:

> While a natural thoroughfare, although wholly within the dominion of a Government, may be passed by commercial ships, of right, yet the nation which constructs an artificial channel may annex such conditions to its use as it pleases.

It will be observed that the special rules for the Panama Canal are laid down in article 3 of the treaty as the "basis of the neutralization of such ship canal" and the preamble of the treaty refers to the maintenance of the "general principle of neutralization" established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The use of the word "neutralization" in this connection is somewhat confusing, for under strict definition neutrality and neutralization can arise only in connection with war or preparations implying war. Yet article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to which reference is made in the preamble, has no reference to war or the conditions of war, but relates only to charges and conditions of traffic. The guaranty of neutrality involving protection from interruption, seizure, or unjust confiscation occurs in article 5 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to which no reference is made in the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Strictly speaking, it seems as if neutrality could apply only to the conditions involved in war or in preparations for war. Moore, in volume 3, page 267, says:

> The term neutralization has come to be used in a sense less strict than that indicated by the author, so as to include an arrangement whereby protection is sought to be guaranteed against hostile attack or hostile interruption, while the same freedom of use is sought to be assured in war as in peace. No doubt, however, the leading motive of agreements of neutralization is to secure exemption from hostile attack and a corresponding prohibition of distinctive hostile use.

Mr. Moore then cites the neutrality of the Free Town of Cracow, the neutralization of the Black Sea, of Luxemburg, the Ionian Islands, the Lower Danube, and the Straits of Magellan, and in all these cases of neutralization, war, or the conditions of war, are dealt with and fortifications are forbidden. Of the six rules of article 3 in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the last five all relate to war, or the conditions of war, and are properly defined as a basis of neutralization. On the other hand, and in this connection it must be remembered that the United States not only insisted on the omission of the prohibition against fortifications embodied in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty but in the treaty with Panama asserted explicitly the right to fortify. In this way the United States made it apparent that neutralization of the canal in the strict sense was limited, and that the prohibition against fortifications, which is found in other cases of neutralization cited by Moore, was here expressly excepted. This action on the part of the United States with the explicit provision in regard to the right to fortify in the treaty with Panama is an assertion on the part of the United States of its absolute control in time of war of the canal passing through the territory which for canal purposes is its own. Having thus limited neutralization in regard to war and asserted control in that direction, it seems to me difficult to argue that "neutralization" as used in article 3 can be held to mean, however loosely we define the word, to debar the United States from treating its own vessels differently from those of other nations when it has distinctly limited neutralization in the direction where neutralization undoubtedly and under the narrowest interpretation must apply. In other words, I fail to see how the word "neutralization," loosely and improperly applied, as I think it is, to the use of the canal in time of peace, can be held to require equality of tolls when it is limited in its own proper and legitimate domain in time of war by the explicitly granted right in the treaty of Panama to build fortifications.

There can be no doubt as a general proposition that the United States, having built the canal in territory which is its own for canal purposes, can determine the conditions for the use of the canal except so far as it has limited that right by contract with other nations. The limitations of that right, if they exist, must be found in article 3 of the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty and in the treaty with Panama, which embodies the rules of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Without the limitations of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty it is admitted that the right of the United States to fix tolls or to control the canal in any way would be absolute. Do the words "all nations" limit this inherent right? They can only do so if they are clear and express, for in no other way can a State part with its rights of sovereignty or property. Otherwise, as Mr. Olney points out, "the presumption is against the State's intention to part with or abridge its jurisdictional or property rights." Therefore the term "all nations," which in this connection is not clear and express, should be construed as excepting the United States, because that is the construction least restrictive of the normal rights and powers of the United States. On the face of the treaty it is not apparent that the United States regarded itself as one of its own customers, and it seems unreasonable to suppose, as I have already said, that when five out of six of the treaty rules do not apply to the United States the sixth was intended to apply.

I might, of course, enlarge very much the propositions which I have briefly set forth and upon which I rest my opinion that the United States has the right to exempt its vessels from tolls in passing through the canal or to make tolls for its own vessels lower than the tolls upon vessels of other nations. But for my purpose to-day it is sufficient to have explained as concisely as possible why I hold the view that under a reasonable interpretation the United States has the right to exempt its own vessels from tolls, provided that it makes the tolls on vessels of all other nations equal, and why I think the phrase "all nations" does not in this connection include the United States.

At this point, however, I part company with those who insist that because we have the right to refuse to collect tolls from or to exempt our own vessels from the payment of tolls we therefore should exercise that right. It does not follow that because we have the right to do something we must therefore exercise it. I have a right to build high walls on each side of my property, assuming that I own a house in a block. The only effect of the exercise of this right would be to deprive my neighbors of light, and although I possess the right I do not exercise it simply for the purpose of annoying my neighbors. As the Senator from Mississippi said the other day, citing Burke:

> If I am the owner of sheep I have the right to shear my sheep in winter, but I do not do it merely because I have the right.

The existence of a right and its exercise are two very different things. Either as individuals or as a nation we may possess certain undoubted rights, and yet it might well be that it would be the height of unwisdom to exercise them. In this case it appears to me that it would be most unwise to exercise the right of exempting our own vessels from tolls simply because we have the right to do so. We must be convinced not only that we have the right but that it is necessary and expedient to exercise it before we put the right in force. The reasons against our exercising this right, which I believe we possess, are to me conclusive, as I said in the debate when we were considering the canal act. I wish now to restate those reasons somewhat more fully and more carefully than I did at that time.

In the first place there is a wide and honest division of opinion as to the correct interpretation of the first rule of article 3 of the treaty and as to the words "all nations." The opinion of foreign nations, with hardly an exception, and that only in the case of some individual, is against the interpretation which I believe to be correct. In the United States opinion is divided and absence of unanimity in the interpretation of the treaty on our side is not to be overlooked in considering what action we shall take. If there were no division of opinion in the United States, or among those in the United States qualified to speak with authority, there would be a much stronger reason for insisting upon our own interpretation and upon the propriety of deciding the question in our own favor than there can be when American opinion is so radically divided. Ex-President Roosevelt, within certain limitations, and ex-President Taft are both of the opinion that we have the right to exempt our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls on passing through the canal. President Wilson, on the other hand, has just told us and told the world that he regards the exemption of our coastwise vessels from tolls as a plain violation of the treaty. Mr. Olney, as I have already shown, agrees with the interpretation which I give to the clause, while the senior Senator from New York holds an opposite opinion, and Mr. Root and Mr. Olney have both been Secretaries of State and are both lawyers of wide learning, great acumen, and the highest ability. These examples sufficiently illustrate the deep and sincere division of opinion upon this point existing in the United States. With such a division of opinion among ourselves I am not willing to expose the United States to the imputation of bad faith among all other nations by insisting on deciding a doubtful point, upon which we ourselves are not agreed, in our own favor simply because we have the power to do so. In the larger consideration of our position among the nations of the earth I think it would be a great mistake, with a divided public opinion at home, to insist upon our own interpretation of the treaty, an interpretation which the rest of the world does not accept.

I now come to a second point which appears to me of great importance. The violation of the plain terms of the treaty, to use President Wilson's language, if it exists by the exemption of our own ships from the payment of tolls, arises and can arise solely from the method by which this exemption is secured.

To exempt our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls is to grant them a subsidy. The Senator from Oklahoma asserted this proposition in his speech the other day, and I do not see how it can possibly be controverted. If we relieve our coastwise vessels passing through the canal from tolls, we subsidize them to that extent. The subsidy is in the relief from tolls, not in the manner in which the relief is granted. This does not disturb me personally at all, because I believe in the policy of subsidies to our merchant marine, and I am sure that we shall never again have any merchant marine until we give to our vessels engaged in foreign trade the same aid which is extended by all other nations to their vessels. The vessels in the foreign trade are those which need a subsidy, if any is to be given in any form, for they are open to foreign competition, and not the vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, which, as against the rest of the world, is a monopoly established by law. But the exemption from tolls, I repeat, is in any form a subsidy. I can understand perfectly the position of those who vote against the toll exemption because they are against subsidies of any kind—that is a logical position, although it is not mine—but I can not quite comprehend the position of those who are against subsidies as a general principle, but who are consumed with a burning desire to confer it in this instance and in this particular manner. Aid to our shipping engaged in traffic between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts plays a great part in the arguments of those who oppose the repeal of the toll exemption. It has been very pleasing to me, as well as a beautiful spectacle for the disinterested observer, to note the pathetic eloquence of many distinguished persons in behalf of aid to American shipping, after they have for years thwarted every attempt effectively to help or build up the American merchant marine. Most earnest pleas have also been made in behalf of the toll exemption because that exemption would be more certain to cripple the transcontinental railroads than any other device. I recognize the importance of this point. Legislation of late years has proceeded largely, and in some cases entirely, upon the desire to injure someone. The principle of destruction has been of late more powerful in our lawmaking than that of construction. The hope of conferring benefits has been secondary to the eagerness to inflict punishment and loss, without regard to guilt or innocence, upon all who suffer from the odium due to success.

In this particular case, as the railroads are explicitly prevented from owning ships passing through the canal, I do not think that either the collection of tolls or their removal would have any effect. The transcontinental roads, with their haul of 3,000 miles, could by no possibility compete with the rates for water-borne freight. There is one case where the toll exemption might have a decided effect, although I am not familiar enough with the statistics to assert this with certainty. The Tehuantepec Railroad, which crosses Mexico at the narrowest point, from Puerto-Mexico, to Salina Cruz, belongs under a government concession to Lord Cowdray, the head of the Pearson interests in Mexico. This concession runs for 51 years, and Lord Cowdray also controls the docks and other terminal facilities at the ports at both ends of the line. The 40,000 acres of oil lands in which Lord Cowdray and Sir Lionel Carden are interested lie, if I am correctly informed, near the eastern terminus of the railroad. Lord Cowdray has a contract with the Hawaiian Steamship Co. by which all their freight passes over the Tehuantepec Railroad and one-third of the freight charges from Hawaii to New York is paid to the railroad. The steamship company reserves the right to abandon the contract on the opening of the Panama Canal. It is said, I know not how correctly, that the toll exemption would enable the Hawaiian Steamship Co. to send its ships through the canal and thus save the large payment now made to Lord Cowdray and the other owners of the Tehuantepec Railroad. How persuasive these facts would be in dealing with this question I do not know. The zeal against trusts and syndicates which has been so potent of late years in the United States has been confined to domestic combinations. There has never been in evidence any desire to protect American industries against foreign trusts and syndicates which export their products to this country and there has been an absolute refusal on the part of Congress to do anything to aid American ships against the foreign shipping syndicates which control freight rates both on the Atlantic and Pacific. But even assuming that in this particular case we should be willing to aid American shipping against an English and Mexican railroad combination, the result can be easily achieved without exempting coastwise vessels from tolls in the precise method adopted in the canal act. As I have just pointed out, to relieve our ships from the payment of tolls is a subsidy, and the manner in which that relief is given has absolutely no bearing upon the character of the aid afforded. No matter how that relief from the payment of tolls is given it is still a subsidy. The only question is whether we shall give it in one way or another. Our right to give the relief from tolls as now provided in the canal act is contested as a violation of treaty obligations. Our right to give this relief by the Government's payment of the tolls for American ships is wholly uncontested. If the American ships pay the tolls and the United States hands back the amount of the tolls, no one denies that this procedure is wholly legitimate under the provisions of the treaty.

Almost all the nations largely engaged in commerce now pay either indirectly or specifically the tolls of their vessels passing through the Suez Canal. They will undoubtedly do the same thing for their vessels which pass through the Panama Canal. If we choose to pay the tolls of our vessels passing through the Panama Canal, it is admitted by England and by all other nations that we have the right to do so. So long as the tolls are paid no one has the right to inquire the source of the payment. If we give our ships the money to pay the tolls and the ships then return that money to the Treasury of the United States, there is no greater charge upon the Treasury than if the vessels go through without the payment of tolls. The vital difference is that one method of relieving our ships from the payment of tolls is admitted by everyone to be legitimate, while the legality of the other method is disputed. When in the debate on the canal act I suggested this solution of the question, I was met with two objections—one that the method I proposed involved a subsidy, which was contrary to the always immutable principles of the Democratic Party, but which I have shown to have no basis, because the exemption from tolls is a subsidy, no matter how it is brought about. The other objection was that the arrangement I proposed was a mere evasion. This is equally baseless as an objection, for a recognized method of obtaining a certain result can not be an evasion of the terms of any agreement. If I have a right of way across land owned by a neighbor, it would be trespass to cross the land at any point except that fixed by the defined right of way. To use the right of way is clearly not an evasion, and there would be no intelligent purpose in insisting on crossing the land at a point where the act would constitute a trespass. If the real purpose of our legislation is to benefit our shipping and insure an invincible competition to the railroads, whether foreign or domestic, the payment of the tolls on American vessels by the Government of the United States is our right of way through the treaty and is admitted to be so by all the nations of the earth. The steadfast refusal to adopt this obvious and undisputed method of aiding American shipping in competition with the transcontinental roads raises the inevitable inference that the primary object of insisting upon a naked toll exemption is not the benefit of American shipping and the reduction of water rates, but to achieve this result in a manner which shall demonstrate our disregard for the opinions and rights of foreign nations, and more particularly for the rights of England under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Personally, I think it most unwise to insist upon exempting our vessels from tolls with the single object of flouting the opinion and disregarding the rights of other nations as those nations understand their rights.

I now come to another point which weighs very strongly with me in deciding against giving relief from tolls to American ships by the method employed by the canal act. Whatever our opinion may be as to the strict legal interpretation of the rules governing the matter of tolls imposed upon vessels passing through the canal, we can not and we ought not to overlook the understanding of those who negotiated the treaty as to the intent and effect of the rules which they framed. As to the nature of the understanding we have direct testimony. Mr. Henry White, who first laid before the British Government the desire of the United States to enter into negotiations for the supersession of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, has stated that Lord Salisbury expressed to him the entire willingness of England to remove all obstacles which the Clayton-Bulwer treaty put in the way of the construction of the canal, and desired only to maintain equality of tolls imposed upon all vessels, including those of the United States. Mr. Choate, who, as I have said, completed the negotiations which resulted in the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty, has publicly stated that the understanding at that time of both parties was the same as that given by Mr. White. The only other American concerned in the actual negotiation of the treaty was the late Mr. Hay, at that time Secretary of State. I know that Mr. Hay's view was the same as that of Mr. Choate and Mr. White. It is therefore clear on the testimony of our three negotiators that the negotiations as they were begun and as they were completed in the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty proceeded on the clear understanding that there was to be no discrimination in the tolls imposed as between the vessels of any nation, including the vessels of the United States.

I am well aware that an understanding of this sort, although an aid perhaps to interpretation, does not bind legally. But there is such a thing as honor in agreements and transactions between nations as there is in agreements between individuals. To the individual man his personal honor appears in a clearer light than national honor to the man acting in a representative capacity. It is regrettable that this should ever be so, but I think there can be no doubt that at certain times it is the fact. The psychology of the crowd is a very different thing from the psychology of the individual men who compose the crowd. A large mass of human beings excited by passion will often act in a manner which no single member of the mass would countenance if he acted alone. In the same way representatives of a nation will sometimes act in the settlement of a national question in a manner which they would not think of adopting in the affairs of private life. Again and again I have seen Senators in this Senate yield on what they supposed was an agreement, because their colleagues with whom the agreement was made had not understood it in the same sense. We have all had similar experiences in our own lives, and we have all tried to be faithful to our standard of personal honor. An honorable man will not insist upon an agreement with a friend, or even with a foe, if he is satisfied that the agreement rests upon or was obtained through a misunderstanding. Honest men, as a rule, are sensitive on points of that kind when they themselves are concerned. We ought always to remember that the honor of our Nation is just as precious as our own personal honor and refuse to do in our corporate what we should shrink from doing in our individual capacity. If there was no doubt, no room for question, that under the terms of these treaties we had no right to exempt by law our vessels from the payment of canal tolls I believe we should unhesitatingly maintain the obligations of the treaties and live up to our bad bargain, if we thought it a bad bargain, no matter how disagreeable it was for us to do so. Where there is a doubt as to the legal interpretation of terms, where opinion in our own country is divided upon that interpretation, it seems to me that the understanding upon which our negotiators framed the treaty should have great weight in our action. I am not willing for one, although I am convinced as to our legal right, to disregard the understanding upon which the treaties were made and insist upon my personal interpretation of the legal effect of the language employed. As a rule of conduct I must apply to my country the same rule which I should try to apply to my own action in the case of a private agreement with a friend.

In his argument a year ago in support of our legal right to exempt our vessels from the payment of tolls Mr. Olney gave as his conclusion that the question should be submitted to arbitration, as it was of a nature to which arbitration was peculiarly applicable. This would be a most honorable and fitting solution. Unfortunately, it is generally believed that it would not be possible to obtain the requisite two-thirds' majority of the Senate in favor of the special agreement which would be necessary to secure the submission of this question of the tolls to an arbitral tribunal. To have arbitration in this case refused would be most unhappy, for as all nations regard this question as clearly within the scope of our general arbitration treaties we should be thought to have disregarded the arbitration as well as the canal treaties, our honor and good faith would be impugned, and we should be looked upon as mere hypocrites in proclaiming, as we have done for many years, our championship of the cause of arbitration and peace.

Whether we shall insist upon giving to our ships two or three millions of dollars in a disputed way is, in my conception, a very small question compared to the larger issues which are here involved. When the year 1909 opened, the United States occupied a higher and stronger position among the nations of the earth than at any period in our history. Never before had we possessed such an influence in international affairs, and that influence had been used beneficently and for the world's peace in two conspicuous instances—at Portsmouth and at Algeciras. Never before had our relations with the various States of Central and South America been so good. It seemed as if the shadow of suspicion which, owing to our dominant and at times domineering power, had darkened and chilled our relations with the people of Latin America had at last been lifted. A world power we had been for many long years, but we had at last become a world power in the finer sense, a power whose active participation and beneficent influence were recognized and desired by other nations in those great questions which concerned the welfare and happiness of all mankind. This great position and this commanding influence have been largely lost. I have no desire to open up old questions or to trace the steps by which this result has come to pass, still less to indulge in criticism or censure upon anyone. I merely note the fact. I am not in the councils of the President of the United States, but I believe that during the past year the present position of the United States in its foreign relations has become very apparent to him, as it has to other responsible and reflecting men, and with this appreciation of our present position has come the earnest wish to retrace some of our steps, at least, and to regain, so far as possible, the high plane which we formerly occupied. It would be an obvious impropriety to point out the specific conditions of our present relations with the various nations, both in the Old World and the New; it is enough to note the fact that we are regarded by other nations with distrust and in some cases with dislike. Rightly or wrongly, they have come to believe that we are not to be trusted; that we make our international relations the sport of politics and treat them as if they were in no wise different from questions of domestic legislation. This has not been in accord with our history or our tradition. Only once have we abrogated a treaty, and then actual if not declared war existed. We have scrupulously observed our international agreements, and where differences have arisen we have settled them not with the high hand of power but by negotiation and arbitration. The President has written the history of his country, and it would be strange, indeed, if he did not desire to maintain our tradition of good faith and fair dealing with the other nations of the earth. It is not well for any country, no matter how powerful, to be an outlaw among the nations. Not so many years ago there were people in England who used to speak with pride of her "splendid isolation," but they soon found out that while isolation might be splendid, it was in the highest degree undesirable. Since those days England has been making every effort to escape from her "splendid isolation," as has been conspicuously shown by the alliance with Japan and the entente with France.

I suppose that at this moment in the midst of the adroitly stimulated passions raised against the President's recommendation that we should repeal the toll exemption it will be thought very poor spirited and even truckling—I believe that is the accepted word—to suggest that in deciding this question we should take into consideration the opinions of other nations. Nevertheless, I consider this a very important element in any decision which I may reach, and I am encouraged to believe that I am right in so thinking, because I have the warrant and authority of the author of the Declaration of Independence. When Jefferson framed that great instrument he declared that the impelling reason for making the Declaration was "a decent respect to the opinions of mankind." That decent respect to the opinions of mankind ought never to be forgotten in the decision of any question which involves the relations of our own country with the other nations of the earth.

The long delay in the ratification by the Senate of the treaties renewing the arbitration treaties of 1908 produced a widespread feeling among other nations that our championship of the principle of arbitration and our loud boasts of our devotion to the cause of peace were the merest hypocrisy, because we seemed ready to abandon the cause of arbitration when it looked as if our treaties might bring us to the arbitration of questions which we did not desire to have decided by an impartial tribunal. The President renewed the arbitration treaties, and finally, after a delay which, as I have said, aroused unpleasant suspicions, those which have been sent to the Senate have been ratified. This was the President's first step, as I look at it, in his effort to restore the influence and reputation of the United States, which he had found to be impaired. His second step is his recommendation of the repeal of the toll-exemption clause of the canal act. I speak wholly without authority, but I believe that he must have thought that our insistence upon a contested interpretation of a treaty and upon a disputed method of relieving our vessels from the payment of tolls has injured us in the opinion of civilized mankind, and that he believes that the object sought in no way justifies the results which will necessarily follow in the attitude of other nations toward us.

He must be, I believe, satisfied, as I am satisfied, that other nations will hesitate long before they will enter upon treaties with a country which insists on deciding all disputed points in treaties in its own favor by a majority vote of Congress. It would not surprise me to learn that the President is of opinion that such disputed points ought to be settled as we have settled them in the past, with which, as a historian, he is familiar, either by negotiation or by arbitration and not by our own votes without appeal and open only to the arbitrament of the sword. He must feel, I think, that by our action, considered in other lands to be in disregard of treaty obligations, we are raising a serious obstacle to the development of closer trade relations with the countries of South America, which are so important to us on every ground. These reasons, which I think must also be very weighty with the President, seem to me not only sound but convincing. There is no particular courage required to insist upon passing our own ships through the canal without the payment of tolls. We incur no physical danger in doing so, and to hurl defiance at the rest of the world under these conditions is no doubt a very agreeable pastime to those who engage in it, more especially as it has the added attraction of being a perfectly safe amusement, but it seems not wholly satisfying as an argument. The attitude of Ajax defying the lightning is not a very inspiring one if there is no lightning to be feared. The outcry about exhibiting subserviency to Great Britain or any other country because we see fit to repeal the tolls seems to me hardly worthy of serious consideration. The United States is altogether too great and too powerful to be subservient to anyone, and the mere fact of suggesting it seems to me to indicate an uneasy suspicion on the part of those from whom it emanates not only of the validity of their position but of the power and greatness of their own country, as to which I, for one, am troubled by no doubts. As I have listened to some recent stirring declarations of our utter fearlessness, of our readiness to face a world in arms, in defense of toll exemption, about which noble cause no country would think of fighting, there have been moments when I have marveled as I thought of the coolness and indifference with which we have contemplated the murder of more than a hundred and fifty Americans not many miles from our own border. The violated rights, the unavenged, the almost unnoticed deaths of those innocent people have seemed to make heroics about canal tolls, where there is no peril to anyone peculiarly out of place.

We obtained by the passage of the toll-exemption clause no legal rights which we did not already possess; we waive none by its repeal. All we have we retain, for the law is merely our own statute for the regulation of the terms upon which the canal shall be used. The larger question which is raised by the toll exemption, however, has a purely international character, and that we ought to decide, now and in the future, not on considerations of pecuniary profit or momentary political exigencies, but on the broad grounds which I have indicated. We should determine what is right without fear and without favor. In reaching our decision let us not forget the words of Washington that—

> The nation which indulges toward another an habitual hatred or habitual fondness is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest.

I am not blind to the political temptations which the situation at this moment presents. I am a strong party man. I believe in government by parties and in party responsibility. I have for many years fought the battles of the Republican Party, alike in days of sunshine and in days of storm and darkness. If life and strength continue, I shall to the best of my ability oppose President Wilson if he is a candidate for reelection and the party which he leads. The allurements of political advantage appeal as strongly to me as they can to any man. But when the relations of my country with other nations are involved I can not yield to them. My politics have always stopped at the water's edge. In any question involving our international relations I have always felt compelled to decide it upon its merits as they appeared to me, without regard to politics. This feeling has twice, at least, obliged me to oppose Presidents of my own political faith upon treaties which they had recommended, a misfortune and unhappiness which I wish might have been spared to me. In a great international question I felt it to be my duty on one occasion to sustain President Cleveland, but his policy in regard to Venezuela in resistance to British claims involved serious issues and grave possibilities; it was not mere posturing and declamation against another country, importing no danger and adapted only to raise the temperature around our polling booths. To-day I must still—

> Obey the voice at eve, obeyed at prime.

I voted and spoke against the toll exemption embodied in the canal act. I can not change now merely because a Democratic President recommends the repeal of that clause which I earnestly resisted. Within our own borders Mr. Wilson is the leader and chief of the Democratic Party. In the presence of foreign nations he is to me simply the President of the United States. If in his high responsibility as the representative of the Nation before the world he does or tries to do what I believe in my conscience to be wrong I shall resist him, no matter what his political faith may be. But if he is doing or trying to do what I conscientiously believe to be right he shall have my full support without regard to party or to politics. To thwart the purposes or to discredit the policies of the official head of a political party is legitimate political warfare. To discredit or break down the President of the United States upon a question of foreign policy is quite another thing, never to be undertaken except for very grave reasons. In the one case we overthrow a party leader and political chief within the arena where the American people alone sit in judgment; in the other we break down and discredit the representative of the whole country in the great forum of the nations of the earth and paralyze his future power and usefulness in that field where he and he alone can declare and represent the policies, the honor, and the dignity of the United States. Conditions may arise where this last resort must be accepted, but it can only be justified by grim necessity. With my view as to the tolls, with my deep convictions as to what is due to the President of the United States when he faces foreign nations, I should be faithless to the principles I have always cherished if I did not now give him an unreserved support.

For these reasons which I have set forth, although I believe we have the right to exempt our vessels from tolls, I have come to the conclusion that this clause in the canal act, which I have opposed from the outset, ought to be repealed. I think it should be repealed because we can obtain the same results, if we desire them, in an undisputed manner and without any greater charge upon the Treasury of the United States. I think so because foreign opinion is united against us, while opinion in our own country is divided as to the proper interpretation of the language of the treaty, and I am not willing to have the good faith of the United States impugned on account of action taken upon such a contested ground as this. I think the exemption clause should be repealed because the understanding upon which the treaty was made is declared by all our negotiators to have been contrary to that which I think a strict legal interpretation of the terms of the rules would warrant. Finally, I think it should be repealed because a decent respect for the opinions of mankind and the high position of the United States among the nations of the world demand it.

Mr. President, the construction of the Panama Canal is one of the greatest achievements of the people of the United States. We owe a debt to the French who preceded us in the attempt to cut the Isthmus at that point, and we freely acknowledge the benefit which we have derived, not only from their surveys and their engineering but from the sacrifices which they so freely made in behalf of this great undertaking. I sincerely hope that the bill proposed by the Senator from Mississippi, to erect a monument to De Lesseps at the entrance to the canal, will be passed, and that that monument will also commemorate the deeds of the men who gave their lives to the task which their country had imposed. I hope, too, that when the canal is opened we shall permit the little boat named Louise, inherited by us from the French, to pass through with the first American battleship, and that we shall then give it to France, so that it may rest upon the waters of the Seine, a memorial to a great work which the people of France first attempted and also to the long friendship of the two nations.

But while France made the first effort and failed, we took up the work and carried it to completion. It is the greatest engineering feat of modern times, and the triumphant result is due not only to the genius of our military engineers but to the labor of the medical officers of the Army, who converted hotbeds of pestilence into a region as healthful as any on the face of the earth. Nothing, to my thinking, could be finer than the work of the great army which Col. Goethals has led to this victory of peace, and which has never faltered or swerved in its onward march through mountains and by lakes. In all that vast expenditure, in all the enormous labors which have been begun and completed upon that historic Isthmus there is no spot or blemish to be found. Not only the canal itself but the manner in which it has been built are among the noblest national achievements, which the history of the United States will cherish and preserve. I trust that all this glory and that this noble work, done not merely for our own profit but for the benefit of the world, will not be disfigured by a desire to put money into the pockets of a few American citizens in a questionable manner. I should be grieved to see this great monument of American genius and American skill defaced by a sorry effort to affront other nations when we complete a vast work designed to promote not trade alone but peace and good will among all mankind. [Applause in the galleries.] [The Vice President rapped with his gavel.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. If this is repeated in the galleries, the galleries must be cleared. There has been an order of the Senate that neither approval nor disapproval shall be manifested in the galleries. The Chair has several times called the attention of the occupants of the galleries to that fact. They are here as the guests of the Senate. They must obey the rules of the Senate or they will not be permitted to attend.

Mr. LODGE. I ask permission to print at the end of my speech extracts from the laws in regard to our coastwise registered, enrolled, and licensed vessels.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That may be done.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The following is the law under which registered vessels engage simultaneously in the foreign and coastwise trade:

[R. S., 3126.]

Any vessel, on being duly registered in pursuance of the laws of the United States, may engage in trade between one port in the United States and one or more ports within the same, with the privilege of touching at one or more foreign ports during the voyage, and land and take in thereat merchandise, passengers and their baggage, and letters and mails. All such vessels shall be furnished by the collectors of the ports at which they shall take in their cargoes in the United States with certified manifests, setting forth the particulars of the cargoes, the marks, number of packages, by whom shipped, to whom consigned, at what port to be delivered; designating such merchandise as is entitled to drawback, or to the privilege of being placed in warehouse; and the masters of all such vessels shall, on their arrival at any port of the United States from any foreign port at which such vessel may have touched, as herein provided, conform to the laws providing for the delivery of manifests of cargo and passengers taken on board at such foreign port, and all other laws regulating the report and entry of vessels from foreign ports, and be subject to all the penalties therein prescribed.

258. FOREIGN MERCHANDISE COASTWISE.

[R. S., 3127.]

Any foreign merchandise taken in at one port of the United States to be conveyed in registered vessels to any other port within the same, either under the provisions relating to warehouses or under the laws regulating the transportation coastwise of merchandise entitled to drawback, as well as any merchandise not entitled to drawback, but on which the import duties chargeable by law shall have been duly paid, shall not become subject to any import duty by reason of the vessel in which they may arrive having touched at a foreign port during the voyage.

The following are the laws under which vessels enrolled and licensed for the coasting trade or fisheries become liable if they engage in the foreign trade without taking out registers:

[R. S., 4377.]
